March 1, 2011

Is Texas Tough on Crime But Soft on Criminal Procedure?

Adam Gershowitz

Available at: https://works.bepress.com/adam_gershowitz/9/
Is Texas Tough on Crime But Soft on Criminal Procedure?

Adam M. Gershowitz

Although Texas is well known for imposing tough punishments on convicted defendants, it is surprisingly generous in affording criminal procedure protections. In a variety of areas, including search and seizure rules, confession requirements, the availability of bail, discovery obligations on prosecutors, and jury trial guarantees, Texas affords protections vastly in excess of what is required by the United States Constitution. Even more shockingly, these criminal procedure guarantees come almost entirely from Texas statutes approved by the Legislature, not activist rules imposed by judges. This article explores Texas’s reputation as a tough-on-crime state and the seeming inconsistency between Texas being tough on crime but generous on criminal procedure.

Everyone knows that Texas is tough on crime. Over the last four decades, Texas has sent more than 1,000 inmates to death row, making it the “capital of capital punishment.”1 Texas is also a leader in incarceration. With nearly 175,000 of its residents behind bars,2 Texas ranks first in the nation in raw incarceration3 and second in per capita incarceration.4 Shaming punishments are also popular in the Lone Star state; one judge shamed so many offenders that he managed to be elected to Congress as a result.5 It is therefore not surprising that

* Associate Professor, University of Houston Law Center. An earlier draft of this article was presented at the Southeastern Association of Law Schools panel “Is Criminal Procedure Less Countermajoritarian Than We Think?” I am grateful to Doug Berman, Corinna Barrett Lain, Arnold Loewy, Richard Meyers, and Ron Wright for helpful suggestions.

3 See Adam Liptak, 1 in 100 Adults Behind Bars, New Study Says, N.Y. TIMES, Feb. 28, 2008 (noting that Texas had recently passed California to have the nation’s largest number of inmates).
4 See Mike McPhee, State’s Inmate Count Up 3.3%: Growth Outpaces National Rate, DENVER POST, Aug. 12, 2001 (explaining that Texas had the second highest per capita incarceration rate, following Louisiana).
many people mistakenly think “Don’t Mess With Texas” is the state’s motto, rather than simply a clever bumper sticker designed to fight littering.

Yet, the story about Texas criminal justice is far more complicated than its reputation reveals. Despite its tough-on-crime reputation, Texas actually has numerous criminal procedure rules that are extremely favorable to criminal defendants. These pro-defendant protections are not mandated by the United States Constitution or the courts. Rather, Texas’s pro-defendant criminal procedure rules are almost exclusively created by Texas statutes enacted by elected legislators, not judges. These protections include strict rules on the admissibility of confessions, extremely pro-defendant search and seizure guarantees, tough limits on denying bail to criminal defendants, favorable discovery rules, and expansive jury trial rights, to name but a few. In some instances, the rules are so favorable to defendants that almost every other state in the nation has rejected them. These rules are a major hindrance to prosecutors and thus directly contradict the notion that Texas is universally hostile to criminal defendants.

This article explores Texas’s reputation as a tough-on-crime state, as well as the little-known fact that the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure is extremely favorable to criminal defendants. Part I reviews why Texas is commonly seen as tough on crime. From its use of the death penalty, to its packed prisons, to its indeterminate sentencing scheme that results in huge up-front sentences that are reduced on the back end by parole, Texas appears quite tough on crime. Part II then reviews some of Texas’s criminal procedure rules that make it far more favorable to criminal defendants than other states. In particular, Part II documents how Texas defendants benefit from search and seizure rules, confession requirements, bond rules, discovery mandates, jury trial guarantees, and numerous other provisions that are far more favorable than Texas is required to provide under the United States Constitution. Finally, Part III raises possible reasons for the inconsistency between Texas’s punitiveness and its favorable criminal procedure rules.

Ironically, the state motto is actually “Friendship.” See Texas Facts, SAN ANTONIO EXPRESS-NEWS, Dec. 31. 2001, at 2B.

The slogan “Don’t Mess With Texas” was created by the Transportation Department for an anti-littering campaign in 1985. It was quickly co-opted by bumper sticker and t-shirt manufacturers however. See “Don’t Mess” With This Texas Slogan: State Agency Might Sue Over Use of Its Catchphrase, ASSOC. PRESS, June 6, 2004.

Indeed, it is only recently that the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals rejected the lockstep approach and began to interpret the Texas Constitution independently of the United States Constitution. See Jessica L. Schneider, Breaking Stride: The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals’ Rejection of the Lockstep Approach 1988-1998, 62 ALBANY L. REV. 1593, 1598 (1999); George E. Dix, Judicial Independence in Defining Criminal Defendants’ Texas Constitutional Rights, 68 TEX. L. REV. 1369, 1374 (1990) (“Texas has a tradition of general judicial passivity in criminal litigation.”).
I. Texas Is Tough on Crime (or So It Seems)

It is not hard to make the case for Texas being tough on crime. From capital punishment to incarceration to shaming sanctions, Texas is at the forefront of imposing stiff punishments. In the sections below, I offer a brief tour of Texas’s reputation for punitiveness.

A. The Capital of Capital Punishment

Texas is the most frequent user of capital punishment in the United States, sending more people to death row than any other state. And unlike other states that frequently impose the death penalty (think of California, which has roughly 700 people languishing on death row), Texas actually carries out executions. Since the Supreme Court reinstated capital punishment in 1976, Texas has executed more than 460 inmates, which is well over one-third of all executions nationwide. In some years, Texas accounts for nearly half of all executions.

Because of its frequent use of the death penalty, Texas has been responsible for a large share of controversial executions, which has furthered the State’s reputation for punitiveness. In 2007, the presiding judge of Texas’s highest criminal court, Sharon Keller, received nearly universal condemnation for closing the courthouse doors at 5pm to an inmate seeking a stay of execution following a promising Supreme Court decision. Despite an initial finding of misconduct, Judge Keller was eventually spared any punishment on technical grounds, thus

---

9 See DEATH PENALTY INFORMATION CENTER, DEATH SENTENCES IN THE UNITED STATES BY STATE AND BY YEAR, available at http://www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/death-sentences-united-states-1977-2008. Until 2004, Texas was the consistent leader nationwide. In recent years, Texas has taken a backseat to California and Florida. See id.

10 See DEATH PENALTY INFORMATION CENTER, STATE BY STATE DATABASE, available at http://www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/state_by_state. See id.

11 See id.

12 There have been slightly more than 1,200 executions since 1976. See DEATH PENALTY INFORMATION CENTER, FACT SHEET, available at http://www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/documents/FactSheet.pdf.

prolonging the firestorm about the failures of Texas’s capital punishment system.\textsuperscript{15}

In 2010, the \textit{New Yorker} magazine published an expose on the 2004 execution of Cameron Todd Willingham, who had been executed for killing his three children in conjunction with the arson of his home.\textsuperscript{16} Based on analysis by nationally renowned fire investigators, the article concluded that the fire had been accidental, not arson, and that Willingham had been innocent.\textsuperscript{17} As with the Keller matter, the \textit{New Yorker} article unleashed a mountain of negative publicity about Texas’s use of capital punishment.\textsuperscript{18} And rather than state leaders simply owning up to the wrongful execution, they attempted to scuttle the truth. Just two days before a forensic commission was due to begin hearings on the matter, Governor Rick Perry replaced the head of the body and the new commissioner promptly cancelled the hearing.\textsuperscript{19} Once again, Texas’s use of capital punishment became major national news.\textsuperscript{20}

Less than a year later, Texas made headlines with the release of death-row inmate Anthony Graves, who was not simply mistakenly convicted,\textsuperscript{21} but was railroaded onto death row as a result of egregious prosecutorial misconduct.\textsuperscript{22} Graves was the twelfth Texas inmate exonerated from death row since the reinstatement of capital punishment.\textsuperscript{23}

Nor are controversies over the Texas death penalty exclusively of recent vintage. The 1998 execution of Karla Faye Tucker (a born-again Christian who found God in prison) sparked a national debate about rehabilitation when then-

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{15} See Mary Alice Robbins, \textit{Case Closed: Special Court of Review Vacates Public Warning, Charges Against Keller}, \textit{Tex. Lawyer}, Oct. 18, 2010, at 1. Rather than quietly let the sorry episode disappear, the judge lashed out at critics by brashly (and inaccurately) claiming “I won. . . . People can call it what they will.” See id.

\textsuperscript{17} See id.

\end{flushleft}
Governor George W. Bush refused to pardon her. And Governor Bush’s seeming indifference to whether the death penalty had been fairly administered under his watch (along with criticism of his legal team’s inattention to clemency requests) tagged Texas with a reputation for executing first and asking questions, later, or perhaps not at all.

On a more mundane level, the dozens of Texas death penalty cases decided by the Supreme Court have left an indelible impression that Texas is synonymous with capital punishment. And in a number of recent cases, the Supreme Court has smacked down Texas capital convictions as unconstitutional.

Of course, the amount of attention paid to capital punishment in Texas is disproportionate to its real-world impact. The State of Texas handles more than 700,000 criminal cases per year, including more than 1,000 homicides.

---

25 See Alan Berlow, The Texas Clemency Memos, THE ATLANTIC, July/Aug. 2003 (recounting the slipshod work of legal counsel Alberto Gonzales in analyzing clemency petitions and observing that Governor Bush never looked at clemency petitions filed by inmates, only summaries compiled by Gonzales); see also R. Jeffrey Smith, Attorneys Criticize Gonzales Clemency Memos, WASH. POST, Jan. 6, 2005 (same).
28 See Adam Liptak & Ralph Blumenthal, Death Sentences in Texas Cases Try Supreme Court’s Patience, N.Y. TIMES, Dec. 5, 2004, at A1 (“In the past year, the Supreme Court has heard three appeals from inmates on death row in Texas, and in each case the prosecutors and the lower courts suffered stinging reversals.”); see also Linda Greenhouse, Justices, 5 to 4, Overturn 3 Texas Death Sentences, N.Y. TIMES, Apr. 26, 2007, at A22; Miller-El v. Dretke, 545 U.S. 231 (2005) (“The State court’s conclusion that the prosecutors’ strikes of Fields and Warren were not racially determined is shown up as wrong to a clear and convincing degree; the state court’s conclusion was unreasonable as well as erroneous.”).
29 Professor Doug Berman has raised a related point about the Supreme Court’s excessively large death penalty docket and its focus on fixing individual errors in capital cases. See Douglas A. Berman, A Capital Waste of Time? Examining the Supreme Court’s Culture of Death, 34 OHIO N. U. L. Rev. 861 (2008).
Death-penalty prosecutions account for only a few dozen of those cases. Yet, rhetoric often outpaces reality. Both supporters and opponents of tough-on-crime policies point to Texas’s use of capital punishment to make their cases. The result is near universal agreement that Texas is the national leader in the death penalty and that it is tough on crime. As detailed below, other criminal justice policies in Texas reinforce the State’s reputation for punitiveness.

B. Texas Is a National Leader in Incarceration

While Texas is most famous for its use of the death penalty, it is also a leader in incarceration. Texas regularly vies for first place with the much larger state of California for incarcerating the most inmates. As of the beginning of 2008, Texas had more than 172,000 people in prison. California, which has twelve million more people than Texas, had only 1,100 more inmates. To its credit, Texas has taken steps to reduce its prison population by shifting offenders to 31 See The Texas Office of Court Administration, District Courts: Activity Summary by Case Type From January 1, 2008 to December 31, 2008 (available at http://168.39.176.29/OCA/ReportSelection.aspx) (identifying more than 1,200 murder cases filed by indictment or information in Texas District Courts during calendar year 2008).

32 See Adam M. Gershowitz, Imposing a Cap on Capital Punishment, 72 Mo. L. Rev. 73, 93-94 (2007).

33 See Gershowitz, Statewide Capital Punishment, supra note 1, at 312-13.

35 See id.

37 See id. at 18.
substance abuse and mental health treatment centers. Yet, when 2009 came to a close, Texas still had more than 171,000 people incarcerated.

Moreover, it is not just raw incarceration in which Texas is a leader. As a per capita matter, Texas ranks second nationally (behind Louisiana) in the number of inmates per residents. According to the National Institute of Corrections, Texas’s incarceration rate is 31% greater than the national average. Texas also vastly exceeds the national average in terms of the percentage of people on probation and parole.

In almost every category of prison statistics, Texas leads the nation. As one author recently explained,

The State’s per capita imprisonment rate . . . [is] three times higher than the Islamic Republic of Iran’s. Although Texas ranks fiftieth among states in the amount of money it spends on indigent criminal defense, it ranks first in prison growth, first in for-profit imprisonment, first in supermax lockdown, [and] first in total number of adults under criminal justice supervision.

The huge number of inmates sentenced to incarceration or awaiting trial in Texas has resulted in overcrowding at jails throughout the state. In counties across the state, overcrowding has led to jails failing inspection. The 41 See NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF CORRECTIONS, STATISTICS FOR THE STATE OF TEXAS (available at http://nicic.gov/Features/StateStats/?State=tx).

---

42 See id.
44 See Lynne Brezosky, 1 in 3 Jails Failing State Check: Harris County Expected to Seek Bonds for More Beds at Facility, on 2006 List, HOUS. CHRON. Apr. 2, 2007, at A1 (noting that 73 of 286 jails failed inspection in 2006 and that four jails inspected in the first few months of 2007 four jails were under remedial orders for overcrowding); Brandi Grissom, Retaliation Alleged in Indictment of Jail Official, TEX. TRIB., Aug. 31, 2010 (noting that Nueces County Jail in Corpus Christi had failed forty percent of its inspections in a five-year period). For a discussion of the most overcrowded jails, see Officials Trying to Ease Overcrowding, DALLAS MORNING NEWS, Aug. 14, 2010 (noting that Dallas jails failed inspections from 2003 until 2010, and that when the jail finally passed inspection in 2010 overcrowding threatened to put it out of compliance again); Roma Khanna, Harris County Jail Fails Inspection: Overcrowding, Broken Toilets Among Complaints, HOUS. CHRON., Apr. 18, 2009, at B2; Ken Rodriguez, Commissioners’ Concerns About Jail Go Unaddressed, SAN ANTONIO EXPRESS-NEWS, Jan. 30, 2009, at 1B (noting that Bexar County overcrowding situation is so bad in Houston that the county government has had to contract with out-of-state jails to house hundreds of its inmates.\textsuperscript{45} Despite having added 100,000 prison beds since the 1980s, the number of Texas prisoners is shortly expected to exceed beds by 17,000.\textsuperscript{46}

Not surprisingly, the over-crowding of Texas prisons and jails goes hand-in-hand with awful conditions of confinement. Local media regularly report inmate deaths occurring in jails due to overcrowding.\textsuperscript{47} Texas newspapers have also highlighted recent federal investigations of both Dallas and Houston jails for civil rights violations.\textsuperscript{48} And Texas politicians do not appear remorseful about prison and jail conditions. Although Texas spends approximately half as much as the national average to incarcerate each inmate,\textsuperscript{49} politicians regularly fall over themselves to demand that it be done cheaper.\textsuperscript{50} The result, not surprisingly, is terrible conditions of confinement.\textsuperscript{51}

\textbf{C. Huge Prison Sentences Create Big Headlines}

\hrule

\textsuperscript{45}See Chris Moran, \textit{Excess Jail Space to Reduce Tab for County Taxpayers}, HOUS. CHRON., Dec. 8, 2010, at B1 (explaining how Harris County sends thousands of jail inmates to Louisiana because of lack of space); Steve McVicker, \textit{First 60 Prisoners Bused to Louisiana: Crowding Here Could Force County to Eventually Send 400 to Private Jail}, HOUS. CHRON., July 14, 2007, at B4.

\textsuperscript{46}See The PEW CENTER ON STATES, \textit{supra} note 40, at 1.

\textsuperscript{48}See Cindy George & Bill Murphy, \textit{Feds Launch Investigation of County Jail: Department of Justice Looking for Federal Violations}, HOUS. CHRON., March 8, 2008, at A1 (discussing federal investigations of both Harris County and Dallas County jails).

\textsuperscript{49}While the national average to incarcerate an inmate is nearly $29,000 per year, Texas spends less than $16,000. See NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF CORRECTIONS, \textit{Statistics for the State of Texas, supra} note 41.

\textsuperscript{51}For an excellent account of the years of litigation aimed at improving the conditions of Texas's prisons, see BEN M. CROUCH & JAMES W. MARQUART, \textit{AN APPEAL TO JUSTICE: LITIGATED REFORM OF TEXAS PRISONS} (1989).
In addition to frequent use of capital punishment and overflowing prisons, Texas also makes headlines by imposing seemingly astronomical sentences in particular cases. For example, while the mean sentence for robbery defendants in the federal system is less than seven years, Texas robbery defendants regularly receive forty-five, fifty, seventy, even ninety-nine years’ incarceration.

Consider the defendant who received thirty-five years for burglary, or the repeat DWI defendant (who was charged as a habitual based on a robbery conviction from many years prior) who was sentenced to twenty-five years. White-collar offenders are not immune from stiff sentences either. An offender who stole between $100,000 and $200,000 received a sentence of twenty years, while a defendant recently convicted of laundering a similar amount of money received forty years. Or consider the Texas drug offender caught with 28 grams of cocaine (and with two prior drug infractions from years before) who received a sentence of 99 years. These huge sentences contribute to Texas’s reputation for punitiveness (and rightly so), but they are somewhat deceiving given Texas’s robust parole system. For most felonies, Texas law requires the defendant to serve only one-quarter of his sentence before becoming eligible for parole. And credit that prisoners receive for good behavior – days they did not actually serve -- counts towards completing the one-fourth requirement. For example, the white-collar offender mentioned above who was sentenced to twenty years for stealing more than $100,000 was paroled after serving less than five years. For the most serious felonies – murder, aggravated kidnapping, sexual assault, and a few others -- the Code is slightly tougher and requires defendants to serve at least one-half of 52 See United States Sentencing Commission, Statistical Information Packet: Fiscal Year 2009 State of Texas 10 (2010) (identifying federal median sentence for robbery as 63 months and mean sentence at 82.2 months).

---

58 See Harris v. State, 204 S.W.3d 19 (Tex. App. – Houston (14th Dist.) 2006).
63 See id.
64 See supra note 59 and accompanying text.
their sentences. Yet, even parole eligibility after serving half of a sentence is a stark contrast from the federal system and many other states that have eliminated parole altogether.

The option for very early parole almost certainly figures into the sentencing decisions of judges and plea bargain offers of prosecutors. Judges and prosecutors who believe a defendant deserves three years’ incarceration may impose a considerably longer sentence to offset parole eligibility and ensure that the defendant serves at least three years. And because Texas has extremely broad sentencing ranges — for instance, five years to life for first-degree felonies — prosecutors and judges have considerable room to increase sentences to account for the possibility of parole. Sentences may thus seem dramatically tougher than expected to the general public that is not versed in the availability of parole.

And the news media dutifully reports the large up-front sentences. After all, it is easy for reporters (who are already stationed in the courthouse) to generate stories when the facts are neatly packaged for them. News articles about how

\[\text{See Tex. Gov’t Code Ann. § 508.145(d).}\]

\[\text{For a list of states that have abolished parole, see Dhammika Dharmapala et al., Legislatures, Judges, and Parole Boards: The Allocation of Discretion Under Determinate Sentencing, 62 FLA. L. REV. 1037, 1045-46 (2010).}\]

\[\text{Take the crime of bribery as an example. Under Texas law, bribery is a second-degree felony, which carries a sentencing range of two to twenty years. See Tex. Pen. Code § 12.33. The average bribery case would seem to be on the less serious end of the class of second-degree felonies. (For instance, the crime of robbery, which involves force or threat of force, is also a second-degree felony. See Tex. Pen. Code § 29.02(b).) One would therefore expect bribery defendants to be sentenced on the lower end of the two to twenty year sentencing range. Yet, there are cases in which defendants get much stiffer sentences. See, e.g., Matt Flores, ACCD Gets Good Report Card: But Strayhorn’s Audit Urges Measures That Could Save Millions for District, SAN ANTONIO EXPRESS, Aug. 23, 2003, at B4 (noting that former official was sentenced to twelve years for bribery). These tougher sentences may simply be because the defendant deserves the punishment imposed. Another quite plausible explanation however is that prosecutors, suspecting that white-collar defendants charged with non-violent offenses will receive early parole, push for tougher up-front sentences to offset the possibility of early release. Cf Elizabeth Albanese, Ex-Trustee Loses Appeal, Bond Buyer, Oct. 10, 2006, at 41 (noting that Texas official sentenced to twelve years for bribery was released on probation after sixteen months).}\]

\[\text{See Stephanos Bibas, Transparency and Participation in Criminal Procedure, 81 N.Y.U. L. REV. 911, 927-28 (2006) (discussing how criminal justice outsiders often misperceive the severity of punishments, although citing examples where outsiders believe sentences are more lenient than they actually are).}\] long a paroled felon actually served are much harder to prepare however. The general public hears about the huge up front sentences, but not the shorter amount of time that inmates actually serve.

The problem of misinformed or incomplete media reporting also applies before sentencing even occurs. When a defendant in a high-profile case is on trial, reporters regularly inform the public of the maximum punishment the defendant could receive even if, in reality, there is no chance the defendant will be sentenced anywhere near that maximum. This problem exists in criminal justice systems across the country, although it is particularly problematic in Texas because of its broad sentencing ranges. Consider the crime of possession of certain controlled substances -- for instance 200 to 400 grams of codeine – which is a second-degree felony punishable by two to twenty years. When NFL football player Johnny Jolly was arrested for codeine possession, the media explained that Jolly “face[d] up to twenty years in prison. Yet, when his case was actually resolved, Jolly escaped jail time and was placed on probation.

Indeed, even legal academics who rail against the Texas clemency system in death penalty cases have devoted virtually zero attention to analyzing how parole is granted in non-capital cases. A search of “parole w/10 eligib! w/10 Texas” in the JLR database on Westlaw brings up only 55 entries, most of which relate to the death penalty. Another common example is the crime of driving while intoxicated, which is a Class B misdemeanor or first-time offenders. Television and newspaper stories across the state regularly report that the defendant could be sentenced to up to 180 days incarceration if she is convicted. For example, when the daughter of Houston’s Mayor was charged with DWI, media reports regularly stated that she faced “up to 180 days in jail” See, e.g., Dale Lezon, Deputy Says Mistakes Made in Mayor’s Daughter’s Arrest: Elena White Pleads Not Guilty in First Day of her DWI Trial, HOUS. CHRON., Feb. 6, 2007, at B3. But in the overwhelming majority of cases, the defendant typically receives probation and serves no jail time. See Adam M. Gershowitz, 12 Unnecessary Men: The Case for Eliminating Jury Trials in Drunk Driving Cases, 2011 U. ILL. L. REV. ___ (forthcoming) available at http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1550733. Thus, a criminal justice outsider who follows mainstream media coverage might believe that Texas punishes its drunk driving offenders far more harshly than it actually does.

Another common example is the crime of driving while intoxicated, which is a Class B misdemeanor or first-time offenders. See Tex. Pen. Code § 49.04. Television and newspaper stories across the state regularly report that the defendant could be sentenced to up to 180 days incarceration if she is convicted. For example, when the daughter of Houston’s Mayor was charged with DWI, media reports regularly stated that she faced “up to 180 days in jail” See, e.g., Dale Lezon, Deputy Says Mistakes Made in Mayor’s Daughter’s Arrest: Elena White Pleads Not Guilty in First Day of her DWI Trial, HOUS. CHRON., Feb. 6, 2007, at B3. But in the overwhelming majority of cases, the defendant typically receives probation and serves no jail time. See Adam M. Gershowitz, 12 Unnecessary Men: The Case for Eliminating Jury Trials in Drunk Driving Cases, 2011 U. ILL. L. REV. ___ (forthcoming) available at http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1550733. Thus, a criminal justice outsider who follows mainstream media coverage might believe that Texas punishes its drunk driving offenders far more harshly than it actually does.

See Deal Gets Jolly Out of Drug Trial: Packers DE Can Have Case Dismissed If He Fulfills Probation Requirements, HOUS. CHRON., Aug. 4. 2010, at 7. And while the newspaper reported both the authorized and actual sentences in Jolly’s case, in many cases with less famous defendants, news reports cover only the high authorized sentence without running a story when the defendant ultimately receives a far milder sentence.
To be sure, Texas authorizes and imposes extremely lengthy sentences on many defendants. And even with early eligibility for parole, many offenders never see the light of day again after entering the Texas criminal justice system. Yet, when it comes to handing down astronomical sentences Texas’ bark appears to be worse than its bite. In many cases, the availability of parole greatly offsets the ultimate time served, though not Texas’s reputation for toughness.

D. Shaming Punishments Attract Enormous Attention

Over the last few decades, shaming punishments have garnered increased attention.\(^{76}\) Academics have almost universally condemned shaming on numerous grounds, including that they harm human dignity.\(^{77}\) Despite all the academic attention, shaming punishments are still fairly rare in the criminal justice system.\(^{78}\) Yet, when such punishments are imposed they receive enormous media attention. And Texas has received a healthy size of that attention.

In the 1990s, the so-called “King of Shame” in the United States was Ted Poe, a felony court judge in Houston, Texas.\(^{79}\) Judge Poe imposed a variety of shaming sanctions, including sandwich boards, public apologies, and requiring DWI offenders to place bumper stickers on their cars announcing their crimes.\(^{80}\) Judge Poe was known both for the creativity of the alternative sanctions and also for the sheer number – more than 300 – that he imposed.\(^{81}\) Poe relished the publicity that came with alternative sanctions and even coined a term -- “Poe-tic Justice”\(^{82}\) – for his punishments. Local news stories about Poe’s sentences abounded,\(^{83}\) and Poe managed to turn his publicity into a seat in the United States House of Representatives.\(^{84}\)

---

\(^{77}\) See Dan Markel, Are Shaming Punishments Beautifully Retributive? Retributivism and the Implications for the Alternative Sanctions Debate, 54 VAND. L. REV. 2157, 2219 (2001) (“Because shaming punishments have as their goal the destruction of a person’s reputation and dignity the shaming punishment denies the very dignity of moral agency that the retributive encounter is designed to uphold.”).

\(^{78}\) See Huschka, supra note 5, at 815.

\(^{79}\) Id. at 833.

\(^{81}\) See Huschka, supra note 5, at 833.

\(^{82}\) Id.

\(^{83}\) See The Original Shame Sentence? Rattling the Bones in Ted Poe’s Closet, HOUSTON PRESS, Jan. 22, 2004 (“In 22 years as a Harris County district judge, Lloyd “Ted” Poe garnered
The actions of a single Houston judge would not be particularly remarkable, except that the publicity has drawn national attention to Texas. For example, a recent story in USA Today discussed how former-Judge Poe had sentenced offenders to shovel manure and how another Texas judge had ordered an abusive father to sleep in a doghouse for thirty days. Similar stories about Poe’s creative sentences have appeared in The Washington Post, Baltimore Sun, Los Angeles Times, Boston Globe, and local newspapers around the country. Poe even appeared on Oprah Winfrey’s nationally syndicated television show to discuss his shaming sanctions.

Even after leaving the bench and spending half-a-decade in Congress, Judge Poe continues to tour the country advocating shaming sanctions. In a Pittsburgh suburb, a prosecutor sought a shaming sanction after hearing Congressman Poe speak to a district attorney’s conference in 2009. The prosecutor explained that Poe is “sort of the modern father of this kind of stuff… So we thought we’d give it a try.”

gallons of ink and miles of videotape from a fawning local media with his zany so-called shame sentences for defendants in his court.”."

84 See Huschka, supra note 5, at 833-34.
87 See Kate Shatzkin, Shame Becomes a Barb in Judges’ Quivers, BALTIMORE SUN, May 17, 1998, at A20 (quoting Ted Poe, a Harris County, Texas, district judge who has become nationally known for what he calls “public punishments”).
88 See Kate Shatzkin, Judges Are Resorting to Shame in Sentencing Criminals: Criminals Wear Placards or Apologize to Victims Publicly, But Some Legal Experts Say the Tactic Is Useless At Best and Repugnant at Worst, LOS ANGELES TIMES, Apr. 26, 1998 (same).
93 Id.
It is important not to make too much of Judge Poe’s notoriety or to focus too heavily on shaming sanctions themselves. As with the death penalty, shaming sanctions are still relatively rare in the context of the entire Texas justice system. Nevertheless, just like capital punishment, the association of shaming sanctions with Texas serves to foster the state’s reputation for being tough on crime.

* * *

As Parts I.A through I.D above demonstrate, it is not difficult to see why Texas has a reputation for being tough on crime. The story is, of course, more nuanced than the bumper sticker warning not to mess with Texas. In recent years, the Texas criminal justice system has improved mental health care, added drug and alcohol treatment, and imposed less stringent penalties for violations of parole and probation.94 At bottom, it seems fairly clear that Texas has earned a national reputation for being tough on defendants who have been convicted, although there is good reason to believe its reputation is somewhat exaggerated. As detailed in Part II, infra, even if we assume Texas is tough on punishment, the complete picture is far more complicated because Texas appears to be quite progressive on criminal procedure.

II. Texas Is Progressive (Or At Least Not “Tough”) on Criminal Procedure

As every student of criminal procedure knows, the Supreme Court of the United States sets a floor of minimum protection for each constitutional guarantee.95 States may not adopt rules that fall beneath that floor (for example, they may not eliminate the right to counsel guaranteed in Gideon v. Wainwright.96 But states are free to adopt more protective rules (for instance, to mandate counsel in all misdemeanor cases, even though the Supreme Court does not require it).97 While no two states have identical codes of criminal procedure, it is clear that some states have gone well beyond what the Supreme Court mandates, while others have afforded little additional protection for criminal defendants.98 Given Texas’s tough-on-crime reputation, conventional wisdom would suggest that the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure should offer criminal defendants little or no added protection beyond what is guaranteed by the United States Constitution. That conventional wisdom is wrong however.

96 372 U.S. 335 (1963) (guaranteeing indigent felony defendants a right to appointed counsel).
97 See Scott v. Illinois, 440 U.S. 367 (1979) (limiting the Sixth Amendment right to counsel only to indigent defendants who are actually sentenced to jail time).

In a variety of areas, Texas has adopted criminal procedure rules that are much more favorable to criminal defendants than has been required by the United States Supreme Court. While some of these guarantees are best characterized as a nuisance to prosecutors, many of the added protections are a major hindrance to district attorneys in their efforts to convict criminal defendants. Moreover, because most of these protective rules are created by statute, they could easily be eliminated by a simple vote of the Legislature. Yet, efforts to scale back these statutory guarantees have been rejected time and again by the Texas Legislature.

In the sections that follow, I review a number of the most salient protections afforded by the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure as well as a few rights guaranteed by the Texas Constitution. My purpose is not to argue that these protections are unnecessary or harmful to the criminal justice system. To the contrary, in many areas the Texas rules helpfully fill in gaps where the Supreme Court of the United States has been insufficiently protective of criminal defendants. My point instead is to demonstrate that even though Texas is a tough-on-crime state, it has a remarkable number of progressive statutory rules of criminal procedure.

A. Unlike Almost Every Other State, Texas Has No Inevitable Discovery Exception, Making it Difficult to Admit Illegally Seized Evidence

For nearly three decades, the Supreme Court of the United States has recognized an inevitable discovery exception to admit illegally seized evidence that the police would have found eventually in a lawful fashion. By way of example, imagine that a police officer pulls over a suspect for drunk driving. Upon arresting the driver, the officer unlawfully searches the trunk of the car and finds cocaine. Even though the cocaine was actually found from an illegal search, it would be admissible in most courthouses across the country under the inevitable discovery doctrine. The reason is that upon arrest for drunk driving, the car would have been impounded and the trunk would have been inventoried pursuant to a department policy. At that point, the bag of cocaine would inevitably have been discovered, thus making it admissible.

100 The search of the trunk is unconstitutional because police cannot search the trunk of the car incident to arrest, there is no consent for the trunk, nor any probable cause to believe contraband is located there.
101 See Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. 367, 375 (1987) (upholding inventory searches of vehicles so long as police “discretion is exercised according to standard criteria and on the basis of something other than suspicion of evidence of criminal activity”).
This scenario – and the dozens of similar ones that happen every day in the United States – demonstrates why prosecutors love the inevitable discovery exception. Put simply, the inevitable discovery doctrine allows for the admission of evidence found from unquestionably illegal searches.

When the Supreme Court officially recognized the inevitable discovery doctrine in 1984 it was not a surprise. In a brief opinion, the Court remarked that every federal court of appeals in the nation and many state courts had already endorsed the inevitable discovery doctrine. And the trend has remained one-directional. Almost thirty years after the Supreme Court’s decision, only two states in the country reject the inevitable discovery doctrine: Texas and Indiana.

The Texas Code of Criminal Procedure rejects the inevitable discovery doctrine by statute. The Texas exclusionary rule expressly forbids the admission of any evidence obtained “in violation of any provisions of the Constitution or laws of the State of Texas, or of the Constitution and laws of the United States of America.” In 1996, Texas’s highest criminal court specifically rejected prosecutors’ arguments to ignore the plain text of the Code, but it practically invited the legislature to amend the statute:

Were we implementing a court-made rule we would of course be free to follow the lead of the United States Supreme Court. However, because this is a statute enacted by the Texas Legislature, we are required to interpret the language of the statute in order to implement the legislative intent in enacting it.

A concurring judge was even more blunt, noting that the Court is “obliged to implement the expressed will of the Legislature.” Despite these direct references to the legislature’s primacy and two impassioned dissents, the 103 Nix, 467 U.S. at 440 & n.2.

---

104 See State v. Flippo, 575 S.E.2d 170, 188 n.23 (W. Va. 2002) (“Only [Indiana and Texas] appear to have expressly refused to recognize the inevitable discovery rule[]” and “only three states, South Carolina, Vermont, and Wyoming, that appear never to have directly addressed the issue of the inevitable discovery rule[]”).

107 Id. at 271.

108 Id. at 274 (Baird, J., concurring).

109 See id. at 274 (McCormick, J., concurring and dissenting); id at 281 (Mansfield, J., dissenting).
Texas legislature has never moved to revise the Code and authorize an inevitable discovery exception.\textsuperscript{110}

The Code of Criminal Procedure’s continued rejection of the inevitable discovery doctrine makes Texas a complete outlier. The only other state to completely reject the doctrine – Indiana – has done so based on its state constitution, not because of a statute that could be overruled by legislative action.\textsuperscript{111} Texas thus stands alone in the nation in rejecting the inevitable discovery doctrine by statutory design. Considering how prosecutors are hampered by the lack of an inevitable discovery exception, the legislature’s inaction is nothing short of stunning.

\textbf{B. Texas Has an Expansive Exclusionary Rule That Suppresses Evidence Illegally Seized by Private Actors}

As all criminal justice observers know, the United States Constitution requires the suppression of evidence found by illegal police activity.\textsuperscript{112} Texas’s statutory exclusionary rule goes even further though by excluding evidence illegally procured by private citizens. Once again, Texas’s rule is drastically out-of-step with the rest of the nation and very beneficial to criminal defendants.

The Texas Code of Criminal Procedure specifies that “[n]o evidence obtained by an officer or other person in violation of [federal or state law] . . . shall be admitted in evidence against the accused on the trial of any criminal case.”\textsuperscript{113} Under this rule, if an individual citizen violates a statutory or constitutional guarantee and turns the resulting evidence over to the police, that evidence will be inadmissible, even if the police had no connection to the misconduct.

For example, in 2005, a priest in Grand Prairie, Texas was charged with possession of child pornography.\textsuperscript{114} Because the lurid images had been illegally procured by private actors – another priest and a church deacon – who searched his computer without consent, the judge was forced to suppress the photos.\textsuperscript{115}

\textsuperscript{110}The text of section 38.23 has changed very little since it was implemented in 1925, despite numerous court decisions interpreting it. \textit{See} Nathan L. Mechler, \textit{Texas’s Statutory Exclusionary Rule: Analyzing The Inadequacies of the Current Application of “Other Person(s)” Pursuant to Article 38.23(A) of the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure}, 36 St. Mary’s L.J. 195, 207-09 (2004).

\textsuperscript{112} \textit{See} Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961).

\textsuperscript{113} Tex. Code Crim Pro. Art. 38.23 (emphasis added).

\textsuperscript{114} \textit{See} Robert Tharp, \textit{Porn Charges Against Priest May Be Tossed: GP Judge Throws Out Evidence, Says Computer Was Searched Illegally}, DALLAS MORNING NEWS, June 10, 2006, at 1B.

\textsuperscript{115} \textit{See id.}
With no evidence to rely on, state prosecutors had no choice but to dismiss the charges.\textsuperscript{116} Although Texas’s statutory exclusionary rule decimated the state prosecution, federal prosecutors were not restricted by a private actor exclusionary rule.\textsuperscript{117} Federal prosecutors therefore charged the priest with violation of federal child pornography laws and relied on the very same evidence that was inadmissible in Texas state court.\textsuperscript{118} The priest pleaded guilty to the federal charges and was sentenced to more than four years in federal prison.\textsuperscript{119}

Texas stands alone in embracing a private actor exclusionary rule. In addition to the federal system, every other state in the nation admits evidence that was unlawfully seized by private actors.\textsuperscript{120}

There is a historical reason why Texas has such an expansive private actor exclusionary rule. Prior to prohibition, Texas had its own liquor laws, and

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{116} See Jason Trahan, Ex-Priest Gets 51 Months for Porn: He Plead Guilty to Viewing Nude Boys on GP Church Computer, DALLAS MORNING NEWS, Dec. 2, 2009, at 1B.
\item \textsuperscript{117} See Brian J. Gross, Eighteenth Annual Review of Criminal Procedure: The Exclusionary Rule, 77 GEO. L.J. 665, 693 (1989) (collecting cases rejecting doctrine in federal court).
\item \textsuperscript{118} See Trahan, supra note 116.
\item \textsuperscript{119} See id.
\end{itemize}
private vigilante groups assisted the police in searching for unlawful whiskey.\textsuperscript{121} When the Texas Legislature drafted its exclusionary rule in 1925, legislators were concerned that these vigilante organizations might take matters into their own hands and undertake searches without police participation, and that private citizens would then hand the evidence to law enforcement on a “silver platter.”\textsuperscript{122} The legislature thus adopted an exclusionary rule that barred evidence seized illegally by private citizens without any governmental involvement.\textsuperscript{123}

With the disappearance of prohibition and organized vigilante organizations, the rationale for a private-party exclusionary rule seemingly has disappeared as well. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals has refused to eliminate the rule though. In a recent opinion, the Court explained that “[u]ntil the Legislature itself decides that the type of vigilante action prevalent during the early Prohibition era is no longer a threat to the privacy interests of Texas citizens, we are bound to follow both the plain language and the manifest legislative intent of the [statute].”\textsuperscript{124}

The Texas Legislature has considered legislation that would delete the “other person” language, but declined to act on it. Shortly after the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals held in 1995 that the statutory exclusionary rule applied to evidence gathered by prior citizens, the Texas House of Representatives introduced a bill to delete the language.\textsuperscript{125} After that proposal was rejected, the bill was renewed in the subsequent legislative session, but failed once again.\textsuperscript{126}

In short, Texas has a much more expansive exclusionary rule than constitutionally required, the judiciary has made clear that the Legislature alone can change this rule, and the Legislature has considered and rejected bills to do so. The Texas Legislature has thus chosen to leave a pro-defendant statute on the books.

C. Texas Has an Extremely Narrow Good Faith Exception

In addition to rejecting the inevitable discovery doctrine and excluding evidence illegally seized by private actors, the Texas statutory exclusionary rule also contains a very narrow good faith exception. Unlike most jurisdictions, the Texas exclusionary rule does not allow evidence seized without probable cause to be admitted simply because the police relied in good faith on a warrant.

---

\textsuperscript{122} Id. at 35.
\textsuperscript{123} See id.
\textsuperscript{124} See id. at 36.
\textsuperscript{125} See 75th Regular Session, HB 2281 (1997).
\textsuperscript{126} See 76th Regular Session, HB 1320 (1999).
In United States v. Leon (1984), the United States Supreme Court recognized a good faith exception for evidence seized based on a defective search warrant.\(^{127}\) In Leon, police had procured a warrant for drugs based on an informant’s tip and confirming observations.\(^{128}\) The trial court later ruled that there was insufficient evidence to create probable cause, thus rendering the warrant invalid.\(^{129}\) On appeal to the Supreme Court, the legal question was whether evidence seized based on a warrant lacking probable cause could still be admissible if the officer had acted in good faith reliance on the warrant.\(^{130}\) The Court sided with the prosecution and adopted a good faith exception, allowing for the admission of evidence seized with less than probable cause,\(^{131}\) so long as the officer relied in good faith on a search warrant issued by a magistrate.\(^{132}\)

Many states have accepted the Supreme Court’s invitation and adopted a good faith exception for warrants lacking probable cause.\(^{133}\) Once again, however, Texas has declined to adopt the rule favored by prosecutors. The Texas statutory exclusionary rule clearly states that the good faith exception applies only to a warrant issued by a neutral magistrate “based on probable cause.”\(^{134}\) Despite protestations by prosecutors, Texas courts have maintained for over two decades that the Texas good faith exception can only apply to small technical requirements (such as typographical errors or omissions) in warrants, not to a lack of probable cause.\(^{135}\)

On multiple occasions, legislators have introduced bills to bring the Texas rule into line with the federal good faith exception. In 1995, 1997, and 2007, the

---

128 See id. at 901.
129 See id. at 903.
130 See id. at 905.
131 See id. at 926. The Court did issue caveats indicating that the good faith exception could not apply if the magistrate was not detached or if the officers were dishonest or reckless in preparing the warrant application. See id.
132 The Supreme Court’s good faith exception caused great concern among the Court’s more liberal justices because they believed it would green-light police to conduct searches in the absence of probable cause. In the end, however, the decision has been primarily symbolic. Police officers rarely procure warrants because most searches fall under one of the exceptions to the warrant requirement. It is even rarer for police to procure a warrant, execute it in good faith, but later find out that there was insufficient evidence to support probable cause. Nevertheless, most states have embraced the Supreme Court’s good faith exception. For a discussion of these points and criticism of the Leon decision on a more fundamental level, see Donald A. Dripps, Living With Leon, 95 YALE L.J. 906 (1986).
134 See Tex. Code Crim. Pro. Art. 38.23(b) (emphasis added).
Texas Legislature rejected these bills. Texas thus retains a more defendant-friendly good faith exception.

D. The Texas Code Imposes Tough Restrictions on Admitting Confessions

In addition to the protective search and seizure rules discussed above, the Texas Code also imposes significant restrictions on confessions that are not required by the federal Constitution.

In the eyes of juries, confessions are typically the most powerful evidence against criminal defendants. Prosecutors thus love confessions. Because confessions are so powerful, they are particularly useful when other evidence is lacking. As a result, police may push hardest for a confession – and use improper tactics -- in the very cases where the evidence is the weakest, thus leading to the possibility of false confessions. Accordingly, critics have argued that courts should impose rigorous procedural safeguards – such as videotaping all custodial interrogations – to ensure that defendants’ rights are protected. The Supreme Court has not done so however. With the exception of the Miranda

---

136 80th Regular Session, HB 1578 (2007); 75th Regular Session, HB 1365 (1997); 74th Regular Session, HB 2047 (1995).
137 See Saul M. Kassin et al., Behavioral Confirmation in the Interrogation Room: On the Dangers of Presuming Guilt, 27 LAW & HUM. BEHAV. 187, 187 (2003) (“In criminal law, confession evidence is the State’s most potent weapon. Mock jury studies have shown that confessions are more persuasive than other forms of incriminating evidence, such as eyewitness identification or character testimony.”); Saul M. Kassin & Holly Sukel, Coerced Confessions and the Jury: An Experimental Test of the “Harmless Error” Rule, 21 LAW & HUM. BEHAV. 27, 42-43 (1997) (finding that “mock jurors did not sufficiently discount a defendant’s confession in reaching a verdict – even when they saw the confession as coerced. . . . Our results thus suggest that confession evidence has a profound context-resistant impact on jurors and should be admitted only with extreme caution.”).
138 See Steven A. Drizin & Richard A. Leo, The Problem of False Confessions in the Post-DNA World, 82 N.C. L. REV. 891, 922 (2004) (“Like police, prosecutors rarely consider the possibility that an entirely innocent suspect has been made to confess falsely . . . When there is a confession, prosecutors tend to charge the defendant with the highest number and types of offenses and are far less likely to initiate or accept a plea bargain to a reduced charge.”).
doctrine (which is commonly seen as a “spectacular failure,”¹⁴¹) the Court has imposed little regulation on confessions.¹⁴² As a supposedly tough-on-crime state, it would make sense for Texas to follow the Supreme Court’s approach and abdicate the regulation of confessions. Once again, however, Texas has done the opposite by imposing rigorous statutory rules.

Although the Supreme Court of the United States has long permitted oral confessions to be admitted so long as they are voluntary and comply with the Miranda doctrine, the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure heavily disfavors oral confessions.¹⁴³ And there are only two main exceptions to the Texas statutory prohibition on oral confessions.¹⁴⁴ First, and in line with the recommendations of many scholars, oral confessions are permitted in Texas if the statement was electronically recorded and the defendant clearly waived his rights on the recording.¹⁴⁵ Second, an oral confession can be admitted against a defendant at trial if, after procuring the confession, police discover evidence that supports the confession.¹⁴⁶ This “found to be true” exception applies, for instance, if the defendant orally confessed to a burglary and the confession led officers to the location of the stolen property.¹⁴⁷ While not as protective as an electronic recording, the “found to be true” exception helps to prevent against wrongful confessions because the confession must be sufficiently accurate to lead police to further evidence of the crime.

In addition to strongly favoring that the suspect’s confession be in writing, the Texas Code also requires that the Miranda warnings (plus an additional warning that the defendant has “the right to terminate the interview at any time”) be provided to the suspect in writing. Moreover, the suspect’s waiver of those warnings must also be in writing on the face of his written statement. The Supreme Court of the United States has never required the Miranda warnings to be in writing, never specified that the suspect be advised of his “right to terminate the interview at any time,” and it has never mandated that waiver be in writing on the face of the confession. Indeed, just last term the Supreme Court issued a decision substantially weakening the waiver doctrine by putting the onus on the defendant to invoke his rights.

¹⁴² See Garrett, supra note 140, at 1110 (“Criminal procedure regulates solely the provision of Miranda warnings at the outset of a custodial interrogation and the voluntariness of admissions of guilt. Having found the admission of guilty voluntary, a court does not assess the formation of a confession narrative, no matter how tainted or unreliable.”).
¹⁴⁴ In addition to the two exceptions discussed above, Texas courts are permitted to admit oral statements that were procured in other states in compliance with those states’ law or oral statements procured by federal officials. See Tex Code Crim. Pro. Art. 38.22 § 8.
¹⁴⁵ See Tex. Code Crim. Pro. Art. 38.22 § 3(a). The Code also requires that all relevant warnings can be heard on the recording, all material voices (i.e. the interrogating officers and the suspect) are identified on the recording, and a copy of the recording is produced to the defendant well in advance of trial. See id.

Finally, and most dramatically different from Supreme Court precedent, the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure actually permits the jury to disregard a confession if it does not believe it was made voluntarily. As in other states, judges rule on defendants’ motions to suppress confessions. However, if a Texas judge refuses to suppress the confession and there is any evidence presented at trial from which the jury could conclude the confession was involuntary, the judge must instruct the jury not to consider the confession unless the jury believes beyond a reasonable doubt that the confession was voluntary.

For example, imagine that a defendant contends that an officer threatened to break his arm unless he confessed. The officer maintains that no such threat was made and the trial judge, believing the officer, denies the suppression motion. In many courthouses outside of Texas, that would be the end of the matter and the evidence would be admissible. In Texas however, if the defendant is able to put his allegation before the jury, the defendant will have another chance to have the confession thrown out, this time by the jury.

In practice, it is rare that juries find confessions to be involuntary. Nevertheless, the option to place the confession’s admissibility before the jury, and effectively to put the police department on trial is a helpful tactic for defense attorneys.

The Texas Code’s detailed requirements for admitting confession evidence makes it more difficult for state prosecutors to utilize confessions than it is for federal prosecutors working across the street. As with other generous criminal procedure rules, the Legislature has contemplated eliminating the statutory protections for confessions. In 1977, the Legislature considered a bill that would \[150\] See Berghuis v. Tompkins, 130 S. Ct. 2250 (2010).

\[152\] See Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368, 378 (1964) (noting the Massachusetts rule (which was similar to the Texas approach) differed from the “orthodox rule” under which the judge himself solely and finally determines the voluntariness of the confession”); see also Voluntariness of Confession Admitted by Court as Question for Jury, 170 A.L.R. 567 (finding that roughly half of states reject Texas’s rule).
have made oral statements admissible in all cases. Ultimately, the Legislature rejected this sweeping change and instead authorized only a limited exception for recorded oral confessions. Further bills to eliminate or scale back the oral confession rule were introduced in 1981, 1985, and 1987, yet despite the support of prosecutors from across the state, these efforts failed.

E. The Legislature Has Refused to Authorize Sobriety Checkpoints

Despite the fact that Texas has a terrible problem with drunk driving – Texas had more than 1,200 drunk-driving fatalities in 2010 and was ranked by MADD as the 5th worst states for DWI – law enforcement officers have not been permitted to set up sobriety checkpoints for nearly two decades. As explained below, the prohibition on sobriety checkpoints stems from a poorly reasoned Texas Court of Criminal Appeals decision that the Legislature could easily overrule. Yet, despite numerous bills having been introduced, the Legislature has never acted.

In the 1990 case of Michigan v. Sitz, the Supreme Court upheld the use of sobriety checkpoints under the special needs exception to the Fourth Amendment. So long as the checkpoints are effective and operated with minimum intrusion, they do not violate the Fourth Amendment. A few years after the Supreme Court’s decision in Sitz, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals ruled on the legality of sobriety checkpoints. In a complete misreading of the Supreme Court’s Sitz decision, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals held that the Fourth Amendment requires the Legislature or another politically accountable body to specifically authorize sobriety checkpoints before they can be set up. Because the Texas legislature had never explicitly authorized checkpoints, the Court prohibited them.

---

154 See id. at 11.
155 See id. at 11-14.
158 See id. at 455.
159 The Supreme Court never specified approval by a legislative body as a prerequisite to a valid sobriety checkpoint. On the ambiguities of the Holt decision, see George E. Dix & The Late Robert O. Dawson, 40 Tex. Prac., Criminal Practice And Procedure § 10.72 (2009).
161 See id.
As a result of the Holt decision, Texas has become one of only ten states that forbid sobriety checkpoints.¹⁶² And most of those ten states prohibit checkpoints because their state constitutions require greater protection than the Fourth Amendment.¹⁶³ The Texas Constitution does not preclude checkpoints however. A simple bill enacted by the Legislature and signed by the Governor could authorize sobriety checkpoints in Texas.

Legislators have attempted to pass a bill authorizing sobriety checkpoints in almost every legislative session since the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals’ Holt decision.¹⁶⁴ Yet, despite the enormous drunk driving problem in Texas¹⁶⁵ and despite the repeated endorsement of law enforcement organizations,¹⁶⁶ every sobriety checkpoint bill has been defeated.¹⁶⁷

F. The Texas Rules for Denying Bail to Dangerous Defendants Are Confusing and Restrictive

In addition to the evidentiary issues discussed above, Texas also has pre-trial release rules that are favorable to criminal defendants. The Texas Constitution makes it difficult for prosecutors to deny bond to dangerous defendants.¹⁶⁸ In addition to imposing a complicated set of rules that lawyers can easily ¹⁶⁵ See supra note 156 and accompanying text.

¹⁶⁶ See, e.g., Guillermo Garcia, SAPD Proposals Win Council OK, SAN ANTONIO EXPRESS NEWS, May 2, 2008, at 5b (noting that the Police Chief of San Antonio, Texas “is seeking the Legislature’s support for several beefed-up DWI efforts, including random, roving sobriety checkpoints – a method that is limited under current state law”).
¹⁶⁷ See News Roundup, SAN ANTONIO EXPRESS-NEWS, Nov. 28, 2010, at B2 (“North Texas lawmakers plan to try again to introduce a sobriety checkpoints bill in the new legislative session. Similar legislation has failed before. The checkpoints have been banned since 1994.”).
¹⁶⁸ See GEORGE E. DIX & ROBERT O. DAWSON, 41 TEx. PrAC., CRIMINAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 16.181 (2001) (“The provisions for denial of bail in certain non-capital cases, contained in Article I, Section 11a of the Texas Constitution, are in many ways more specific and certainly are more procedurally complex than those for denial of bail in capital prosecutions.”).
misunderstand, the Texas Constitution also imposes a short window for prosecutors to produce live evidence in support of a motion to deny bail.\textsuperscript{169} Additionally, bond amounts for many Texas defendants are considerably lower than the amounts imposed by jurisdictions outside of Texas. In part because of these rules, many defendants who would be detained in advance of trial in other states are granted bail in Texas.

The Texas Constitution does not permit judges simply to deny bail to a defendant because he committed a particularly egregious crime, is a clear threat to the community, or has a laundry list of prior convictions.\textsuperscript{170} Rather, the judge must determine whether the defendant fits specifically into one of a handful of categories provided by the Constitution. And those categories are complicated. In short, the Texas Constitution allows a defendant to be “no-bonded” when he is accused of committing (1) a felony and has two previous felony convictions; (2) a felony while out on bail for a pending felony; (3) a felony involving a deadly weapon and has a previous conviction for a felony; (4) a violent or sexual offense while under supervision such as probation; (5) a crime of family violence and who violates a condition of bail; or (6) a capital felony where proof is evident.\textsuperscript{171}

As the long list of rules above indicates, the Texas bail rules are complicated. Anecdotally, prosecutors and defense attorneys will concede that many practicing lawyers and felony court judges – even those with considerable experience -- simply do not understand the rules governing the denial of bail in Texas cases. And because prosecutors and judges sometimes do not understand the rules, they mistakenly fail to deny bail to defendants who fall within the statutory requirements.

Additionally, even if judges properly deny bail, there is another trap for the unwary. The Texas Constitution requires that judges hold a hearing on the denial of bail within seven calendar days of defendant’s initial incarceration.\textsuperscript{172} As Professors Dix and Dawson have observed, the Court of Criminal Appeals treats the seven-day rule as jurisdictional and enforces it with “care and rigor.”\textsuperscript{173} Accordingly, in cases where prosecutors and judges fail to initiate such a hearing and savvy defense lawyers lay low for seven days, the defendant must be granted bail.

Moreover, when bail is available – which it is in most cases – the amount of money is surprisingly low. In Harris County – Texas’s largest jurisdiction – the standard bail amount for a first-degree felony is only $20,000.\textsuperscript{174} For non-capital

\textsuperscript{169} See Tex. Const. Art. 1 § 11(a).
\textsuperscript{170} See DIX & DAWSON, supra note 168, at § 16.12 (“Bail cannot, for example, be denied on the basis that a felony defendant is accused of numerous offenses”).
\textsuperscript{172} See Tex. Const. Art. 1 § 11(a).
\textsuperscript{173} DIX & DAWSON, supra note 168, at § 16.192.
\textsuperscript{174} See HARRIS COUNTY DISTRICT COURTS, DISTRICT COURT BAIL SCHEDULE, available at http://www.justex.net/BailBondSchedule.aspx. The Court of Criminal Appeals has murder cases, the presumptive bail amount is only $50,000. Similarly low bail amounts are in place in Fort Worth and Dallas. Judges, of course, are free to increase bail beyond the standard amounts so long as they do not raise it impermissibly high. Nevertheless, it is not the least bit unusual for alleged murders to be granted bail at fairly low rates in Texas and remain free pending trial. And occasionally, murder defendants who have posted low bail amounts of $50,000, $35,000, or as low as $10,000 decide to flee rather than show up for trial.

By contrast, jurisdictions outside of Texas impose much tougher bail amounts. Many counties – including some in the more liberal state of California – outrightly deny bail to all murder defendants. In New Jersey, the statewide bail schedule sets the presumptive minimum bail for murder cases at $250,000, which is more than five times the presumptive amount in Houston.

175 See Tarrant County Criminal District Judges Recommended Bond Schedule (2011) (on file with the author).
176 See Dallas County Recommended Bond Schedule (2009) (on file with the author).
177 See Brian Rogers, Pasadena Man Accused of Killing Stepdaughter Posts Bail: Woman Died Saving Mother From Attack, Husband Says, HOUS. CHRON., Aug. 19, 2008 (explaining how judge raised murder defendant’s bail from $50,000 to $100,000).
179 See id. (“A Huntsville man who was charged with capital murder in 2006 and then released twice on [$50,000] bond . . . is on the lam after not showing up for trial.”).
181 See id. (“A Huntsville man who was charged with capital murder in 2006 and then released twice on [$50,000] bond . . . is on the lam after not showing up for trial.”).
183 See, e.g., In re: Criminal Bail Schedule for Seminole County, Florida, Eighteenth Judicial Circuit Administrative Order No. 08-03-2(A2) (2010) (prohibiting bail for any first-degree felony punishable by life); Superior Court of California, County of Nevada Felony Bail Schedule (on file with the author) (prohibiting bail in murder cases); Tulare County Superior Court Felony/Misdemeanor Bail Schedule 2009 (on file with author) (same).
184 See Memorandum from Phillip S. Carchman, Administrative Director of the Courts to Assignment Judges (May 12, 2005) [hereinafter New Jersey Bond
Angeles County, California – a jurisdiction every bit as busy as Texas’s largest cities – the presumptive bail amount for non-capital murder is $1,000,000.\textsuperscript{186}

The divergence is equally clear for other felonies besides murder. For many first-degree felonies – for instance, kidnapping, manslaughter, and sexual assault – other states require hundreds of thousands of dollars for defendants to post bail,\textsuperscript{187} compared to $20,000 in Houston\textsuperscript{188} or $25,000 in Fort Worth\textsuperscript{189} and Dallas.\textsuperscript{190} To paint an even starker picture, consider that some California jurisdictions set the same presumptive bail amount for burglary cases and campaign finance violations that Texas cities uses for murder cases.\textsuperscript{191}

In sum, many Texas defendants find it much easier to post bail than their counterparts in other states. Unlike the search and seizure and confession rules discussed above, Texas’s bond rules result not from the state legislature’s choices, but from the state constitution and from local bond schedules. Nevertheless, the fact remains that defendants seeking bail in Texas are in a far better situation than would be expected in a tough-on-crime state.

\textbf{G. Statutory Discovery Rules Are Far More Favorable to Defendants in Texas than Most Other Jurisdictions}

As a general matter, there is far less discovery in criminal cases than in civil matters.\textsuperscript{192} Defendants have a limited constitutional guarantee to receive favorable and material evidence under the \textit{Brady} doctrine,\textsuperscript{193} but beyond that the availability of discovery is almost entirely a creature of statute.\textsuperscript{194} And while informal discovery is present and effective in most well-functioning criminal

\begin{footnotes}
\textsuperscript{186} See \textsc{Superior Court of California, Los Angeles County, Felony Bail Schedule 3} (2011) (on file with the author).
\textsuperscript{187} See \textit{id.}; see also \textsc{New Jersey Bond Schedule, supra} note 185.
\textsuperscript{188} See \textsc{Harris County District Courts, District Court Bail Schedule, supra} note 174.
\textsuperscript{189} See \textsc{Tarrant County Criminal District Judges Recommended Bond Schedule, supra} note 176.
\textsuperscript{190} See \textsc{Dallas County Recommended Bond Schedule, supra} note 177.
\textsuperscript{191} See \textsc{Tulare County Superior Court Felony/Misdemeanor Bail Schedule, supra} note 184 ($50,000 for burglary); \textsc{Los Angeles County, Felony Bail Schedule, supra} note 186, at 3 ($50,000 for campaign violations).
\textsuperscript{192} See \textsc{John G. Douglass, Balancing Hearsay and Criminal Discovery, 68 Fordham L. Rev.} 2007, 2146-50 (2000).
\textsuperscript{193} See Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963).
\textsuperscript{194} \textit{But see} \textsc{Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78} (1970) (upholding state rules requiring defendants to provide notice and information to prosecution about their alibi defense).
\end{footnotes}
courthouses, defendants statutory rights to discovery remains important, and quite limited, in most states. To the extent there is a national trend toward more discovery in criminal cases it is actually a trend toward defendants being required to produce information to the prosecution. Once again, however, Texas is different. Not only do Texas defendants have a statutory right to receive considerable discovery, the Texas Code rejects most of the defendant disclosures adopted by other states over the last few decades. Additionally, Texas has detailed discovery obligations that prosecutors must comply with for evidence to be used at the sentencing phase of trials. These pro-defendant discovery rules are explained below.

1. Texas Defendants Have Greater Statutory Rights to Discovery Than Defendants in Federal Court and Many Other States

Defendants’ right to statutory discovery varies widely by jurisdiction. As Professor Jenny Roberts has explained, > Around one-third of the states have relatively broad discovery rules or statutes, modeled on American Bar Association standards. But about a dozen states follow the highly restrictive federal rule, which is premised in part on the idea that a defendant should not be entitled to witness names or statements for pretrial investigation, but rather only for cross-examination purposes should the case ever get to that stage. The remaining states fall between the two models.

The discovery divide among the states is best illustrated by the crucial question of witness lists. In the federal system and in some states, the defendant is not entitled to know the identity of the prosecution’s witnesses until the jury has been sworn. Prosecutors may, as a matter of courtesy, inform defense lawyers in advance, but there is nothing to prevent prosecutors from the Perry Mason moment in which the unknown witness walks through the courtroom

---

195 See John G. Douglass, Fatal Attraction? The Uneasy Courtship of Brady and Plea Bargaining, 50 EMORY L.J. 437, 457-62 (2001) (discussing informal discovery and noting that “[f]or the most part, the process works effectively”).
doors. By contrast, about half of the states require prosecutors to provide not just witness names, but also their addresses and prior statements before trial.\textsuperscript{199}

Texas falls on the more generous end of the scale. Courts have interpreted the Texas Code to require\textsuperscript{200} the State to disclose “a list of witnesses it intends to use at trial, photographs, defendant’s written statements, letters, accounts, and other evidence material to any matter in the case.”\textsuperscript{201} While Texas is not the most generous state in terms of discovery, it is certainly more generous in providing information to criminal defendants than many states and the federal system. Moreover, as discussed below, Texas is among a dwindling minority of states that prevents prosecutors from discovering valuable information from defendants in advance of trial.

2. Despite a National Trend Toward Requiring Disclosure by Defendants, Texas Requires Defendants to Produce Almost Nothing in Advance of Trial

Over the last few decades, states have imposed reciprocity requirements that force defendants to disclose witness lists and preview their defense theory in exchange for receiving certain discovery from the Government.\textsuperscript{202} And many states go even further by giving prosecutors an independent right to discover information from the defense.\textsuperscript{203} State statutes across the country permit prosecutors to discover information about the defendant’s alibi, statements by defense witnesses, expert reports, tangible objects and a slew of other information.\textsuperscript{204}

As noted, Texas prosecutors must turn over witness lists and other materials to defendants in advance of trial. Yet, prosecutors have no reciprocal right to receive such discovery from defendants. Texas judges lack statutory authority to \textsuperscript{200} While courts regularly order the disclosure of witness lists, at least two commentators caution that the word “require” may be too strong. As Professors Dix and Dawson have observed, “the appellate case law contains no case in which a trial judge’s refusal to require the state to provide a complete witness list is held reversible error.” GEORGE E. DIX & ROBERT O. DAWSON, 42 TEX. PRAC., CRIMINAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 22.171 (2001).

\textsuperscript{202} See Mosteller, supra note 196, at 1580.
\textsuperscript{203} See id. at 1580-81.
\textsuperscript{204} See id. at 1579-82.
force defendants to produce any information about fact witnesses. As two noted commentators have remarked, “[t]here is universal agreement that trial judges lack authority to compel the defense to provide the State with its witness list.”

While there is good reason not to impose discovery obligations on defendants, it is clear that such a firm stance handicaps the Government’s efforts to convict defendants. Prosecutors regularly complain that they are “flying blind” at trial because they have no idea who the defense might call and what theory of the case might be put forward.

Once again, the Texas legislature has been in a position to follow the national trend and adopt a pro-prosecution rule that permits some discovery from defendants before trial, but it has not done so. Indeed, in 1999, the Legislature made a very narrow change to the Texas discovery statute so that judges could (but were not obligated to) order defendants to disclose their expert witnesses prior to trial. The Legislature could have imposed additional burdens on defendants to disclose fact witnesses and to provide notice of alibi defenses (as many other states have done) but it declined to do so.

3. Prosecutor Disclosure of Extraneous Offenses for the Punishment Phase Is Required by the Code and Is Burdensome to Prosecutors

The Texas Code of Criminal Procedure also causes discovery headaches for prosecutors at the punishment phase of trials. At sentencing, judges and juries are called upon to consider not just the gravity of the offense committed, but the offender himself. To do so, the fact-finder looks beyond the instant crime and considers extraneous behavior, such as prior criminal convictions and bad acts that did not result in conviction. Under Article 37.07 of the Texas Code, prosecutors must give advance notice of all extraneous offenses they plan to 207 For an argument against too much discovery from defendants, see Mosteller, supra note 196.

208 See Thornton, 37 S.W.3d at 493 (discussing the 1999 revision to Tex. Code Crim. Pro. § 39.14(b)).

209 See supra notes 202-04 and accompanying text.
introduce at the punishment stage. Prosecutors must identify the nature of the act, the date when it happened, the county where it occurred, and the victim who was harmed.

Although disclosure of extraneous offenses seems simple in the abstract, it is actually burdensome to prosecutors. In many Texas counties, prosecutors are overburdened with huge caseloads and they struggle simply to prepare their case-in-chief. Accordingly, prosecutors sometimes do not turn their attention to the punishment phase until the eve of trial and often do not discover valuable extraneous offenses in time to give notice of the date, location, and victim of prior misconduct by the defendant. At that point, judges should exclude those extraneous offenses from consideration.

For example, consider a hypothetical case in which a defendant has been indicted for fraudulently selling land she did not own to a poor immigrant named Maria. A few days before trial, Maria off-handedly mentions to the prosecutor that the defendant committed the same type of land fraud against three other victims who Maria knew only on a first-name basis. The prosecutor tries to get in touch with these other three victims but, because time is short, she is unable to contact them before trial begins. Without the victims’ full names and the dates when they were defrauded, the prosecutor is unable to give proper notice of these extraneous offenses as required under the Texas Code. In the middle of trial, the prosecutor finally locates the other three victims and they all indicate that they would testify that, just like Maria, they were tricked into paying for land that the defendant did not own. This evidence is certainly relevant at the punishment stage and would be quite helpful to the prosecutor in showing a pattern of misconduct by the defendant. Yet, the prosecutor likely will be prohibited from using this testimony because of lack of notice. (And, if

---

210 See Tex. Code Crim. Pro. § 37.07(3)(g). Defense attorneys are required to request notice in order for this provision to be applicable, but most defense attorneys simply do so in a standard form discovery request in all of their cases.
211 See id.
213 See, e.g., James v. State, 47 S.W.3d 710 (Tex. App. – Texarkana 2001) (vacating punishment because prosecutor failed to provide notice of the date of extraneous sexual abuse allegations admitted into evidence at punishment stage).
214 But see Edward L. Wilkinson, Punishment Evidence: Grunsfeld Ten Years Later, 35 ST. MARY’S L.J. 603 (2004) (noting that “the reasonableness of the State’s notice turns on the facts and circumstances of each case” and citing cases indicating that “[w]hile notice as late as the Friday before trial beginning the following Monday has been held to be unreasonable, under other circumstances notice while trial is underway has been held to be “reasonable”).
the statute of limitations has passed, a stand-alone prosecution would be forbidden as well.)

In the case outlined above, the Texas discovery rules would work an injustice by forbidding the fact-finder from considering relevant punishment evidence. On the other hand, there are surely cases where defendants would suffer unfairly by allowing prosecutors to surprise them with extraneous offenses without adequate notice. While the optimal amount of notice is debatable, it is noteworthy that once again Texas has adopted a rule that is more favorable to defendants than is required. In fact, Texas has rejected its own notice rule for death penalty cases. Under the separate Texas statute governing capital murder cases, prosecutors are not required to give advance notice before introducing extraneous offenses at the punishment phase. The Legislature could easily apply this rule to non-capital cases, but has chosen not to do so.

* * *

In sum, the Code requires prosecutors to provide defendants with considerable fact discovery as well as notice of extraneous offenses for the punishment stage, while receiving virtually no discovery in return. The Texas Code thus advantages defendants by making the discovery process more burdensome for prosecutors.

H. Texas Defendants in All Criminal Cases – Including Traffic Violations – Are Entitled to a Jury Trial and Can Even Request That the Jury Decide Their Sentence

The Supreme Court of the United States has long made clear that criminal defendants do not have a Sixth Amendment right to a jury in all criminal cases. Rather, defendants must be charged with an offense that carries more than six months’ incarceration in order to qualify for a jury trial under the federal Constitution. Additionally, with the exception of death penalty cases, the Supreme Court has never required any involvement by the jury at the sentencing phase of trial. These two limitations on the jury trial right ostensibly benefit the prosecution. Texas has rejected both rules however.

215 See Janet Morrow & Robert Morrow, In a Narrow Grave: Texas Punishment Law in Capital Murder Cases, 43 S. TEX. L. REV. 979, 1095 (2002) (“A capital defendant is not entitled to notice by statute that the State intends to offer evidence of an unadjudicated extraneous offense against him at punishment, even though Texas statutes require such notice to the defendant in a non-capital case.”).

217 As Professor Andrew Leipold has documented, defense lawyers have a strong preference for juries. See Andrew D. Leipold, Why Are Federal Judges So Acquittal Prone, 83 WASH. U. L.Q. 151, 158-63 (2005). The saying goes that a guilty defendant tries his luck with the jury, while an innocent defendant goes to the judge. See Richard A.
1. Defendants in All Cases – Even Those Charged With Running a Stop Sign – Can Demand a Jury Trial in Texas

Although most states continue to afford a jury trial right in all criminal cases carrying jail time, nine states have accepted the Supreme Court’s invitation and eliminated the requirement of a jury trial for low-level misdemeanors carrying six months or less incarceration. In these states, defendants charged with drunk driving, marijuana possession, and other similarly minor offenses can be sentenced to jail time without the benefit of a jury. Some states that cannot take this approach (because their state constitutions require jury trials in all criminal cases) have managed to eliminate juries for the lowest level offenses by classifying them as infractions, rather than conventional crimes.

In Texas, the right to a jury trial remains sacrosanct. Much like the Sixth Amendment, the Texas Constitution specifies that “[i]n all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have a speedy public trial by an impartial jury.” And over thirty years ago, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals rejected the Supreme Court’s invitation to eliminate jury trials in minor cases. Moreover, the Texas Penal Code classifies even the most minor offenses – think of traffic tickets for running a stop sign or driving without insurance -- as criminal offenses, not non-criminal infractions. While these tickets carry only a fine and no jail time, they are classified as Class C misdemeanors in the Texas Penal Code. Thus, when a defendant is ticketed for a traffic offense, she has a right to a jury trial.

---

Posner, An Economic Approach to the Law of Evidence, 51 STAN. L. REV. 1477, 1501 (1999) (“If juries are less accurate guilt determiners than judges, innocent defendants will choose to be tried by judges rather than run the risk of jury mistake, while guilty defendants will choose to be tried by juries, hoping for a mistake. The acquittal rate should therefore be higher in bench trials – and it is.”).

218 See Gershowitz, 12 Unnecessary Men, supra note 71, at 10 & n.60.

219 See, e.g., Mitchell v. Superior Court, 783 P.2d 731, 738 (Cal. 1989) (“In contrast to the federal jury trial guaranty, which draws a distinction between ‘serious’ and ‘petty’ criminal offenses and requires a jury trial only for those offenses which fall into the ‘serious’ category, the right to trial by jury embodied in the California Constitution extends to so-called ‘petty’ as well as to ‘serious’ criminal offenses, i.e., to all misdemeanors as well as to all felonies. Under the California Constitution, only infractions not punishable by imprisonment (§ 19c) are not within the jury trial guaranty.”). See also MODEL PENAL CODE § 1.04(5) (setting forth a category of “violations” which do not constitute a crime and which “shall not give rise to any disability or legal disadvantage based on conviction of a criminal offense”).

222 In fact, the Texas jury trial right is so expansive that it permits defendants convicted of Class C misdemeanors in Justice of the Peace Court to appeal the conviction to county court and receive a trial de novo. See Tex. Code Crim. Pro. Art. 4.08.
Texas’s expansive jury trial right is not simply a paper guarantee with no real world significance. Every day, Texas juries are empanelled to handle traffic cases and other low-level offenses. For instance, on November 4, 2010, the author, along with 32 other people, was called for jury duty in Justice of the Peace Court in Harris County, Texas to adjudicate a case where the defendant was charged with running a stop sign. After voir dire, the court empanelled a six-person jury to hear testimony. The defendant was ultimately convicted.

In another similarly low stakes case, a Harris County defendant was charged with catching a fish that was a few inches too small -- a Class C misdemeanor in Texas carrying a maximum fine of $500. Rather than pay the fine (which the prosecutor offered to knock down to $50), the defendant insisted on having a trial by jury. The court summoned forty prospective jurors and empanelled a six-person jury. After the jury acquitted the defendant, one juror remarked that he thought the defendant was guilty, but voted to acquit because “it was a waste of everyone’s time for the prosecutor to drag everyone into court over a fish.”

As the under-sized fish case demonstrates, Texas jurors will sometimes nullify the prosecution of factually guilty defendants because they blame the prosecution for wasting their time (even though it was the defendant, not the prosecutor, who invoked the jury trial). Regardless of whether one believes expansive jury trial rights are good or bad public policy, it seems clear that the policy makes it harder for prosecutors to convict some defendants.

2. Criminal Defendants Have the Option to Choose Between the Jury and Judge for Sentencing, Allowing Them to Pick Whoever They Think Will Be Less Punitive

In the federal system and almost all of the states, judges are exclusively responsible for sentencing in non-capital cases. The Texas framework is very different however. In Texas, defendants have the exclusive option, prior to trial, to choose whether to be sentenced by the judge or the jury. So long as the defendant does not try to change his election after trial has begun, prosecutors 223 See Interview with Danny Lacayo, Assistant District Attorney, Harris County District Attorney’s Office (Jan. 24, 2010).

224 See id.
225 See id.
226 See id.
227 I have previously argued that guaranteeing jury trials for low-level offenses is bad public policy. See Gershowitz, 12 Unnecessary Men, supra note 71.
have no authority to impede a defendant’s choice. This approach is so unique – and so favorable to criminal defendants – that only one other state in the nation has adopted it. As with the search and seizure and confession rules discussed above, this unique pro-defendant rule is a statutory right that could easily be overruled by the legislature.

The option for jury sentencing is very favorable to Texas criminal defendants. Because judges are repeat players in the criminal justice system and sentence hundreds of defendants per year, it is well known in the courthouse which judges are tough and which are lenient. And because Texas is an indeterminate sentencing state with extremely broad sentencing ranges, the possible difference between the punishment a judge or jury might impose is enormous.

If Judge A is reputed to be extremely tough, defendants in that court typically elect to have the jury assess punishment because they have better odds of a lighter sentence. If Judge B is regarded as lenient, defendants almost always elect to have the judge, not the jury, impose punishment. Consider a real-world example from Harris County, Texas. From 2005 to 2008, Judge Devon Anderson presided over the 177th District Court and was regarded as a tough 230 See id. The only time a defendant needs permission of the prosecution to change his election from jury to judge is if he has elected jury sentencing before the start of trial and has subsequently changed his mind. See id.

---

231 Missouri is the lone state to adopt the Texas framework. See Mo. Ann. Stat. § 557.036(4)(1). A few other states have adopted jury sentencing, although they give prosecutors more input on the decision to waive the jury. See Morris B. Hoffman, The Case for Jury Sentencing, 52 Duke L.J. 951, 1006 (2003) (explaining that in Arkansas the defendant needs the consent of the prosecution to waive jury sentencing, and that in Oklahoma and Virginia the defendant can only waive jury sentencing with the consent of the prosecutor and the judge); Jenia Iontcheva, Jury Sentencing as Democratic Practice, 89 Va. L. Rev. 311, 376-77 (2003) (“Kentucky allows waiver of jury sentencing only with the assent of the prosecution.”).

232 As one Texas appellate court has explained, “[a] defendant in a criminal case has no constitutional right to have a jury assess punishment. He does, however, have a statutory right to have a jury assess punishment.” Sterry v. State, 959 S.W.2d 249, 257 (Tex. App. –Dallas 1997).

233 See Gershowitz, 12 Unnecessary Men, supra note 71, at 37.

234 For instance, in a first-degree felony case, a judge could choose to impose ten years while a jury might opt to give the defendant thirty years or even more. See Tex. Pen. Code § 12.32 (carrying a range of five to ninety-nine years for first-degree felonies). In a second-degree felony, the judge could choose to impose the maximum of twenty years, while the jury could impose the minimum sentence of two years. See Tex. Pen. Code §12.33 (carrying a range of two to twenty years for second-degree felonies).

235 To put the matter metaphorically, although Texas defendants do not get two bites at the sentencing apple, they do have the opportunity to look carefully at one of the apples before deciding which one to bite into.
sentencing judge. Defendants who proceeded to trial regularly elected to be sentenced by the jury because they believed they would receive a lighter sentence. In 2008, Kevin Fine, a defense attorney who campaigned on the idea that his prior problems with drug addiction would better enable him to deal with many felony defendants, unseated Judge Anderson. Not surprisingly, in the two years since Judge Fine has taken the bench, the majority of defendants in the 177th District Court now decline jury sentencing and elect to be sentenced by Judge Fine.

This is not to say that Texas prosecutors always hate the idea of the defendant having a choice between jury and judge sentencing. As prosecutors and defense attorneys well know, jury sentencing is a wild card, and sometimes defendants make the wrong choice. Many prosecutors have war stories in which they feared a jury would impose a light sentence, only to have the jury impose a far tougher sentence than the judge likely would have handed down. Those stories are the exception however. In most cases, when defendants have basic background information about the presiding judge and are presented with the option to choose between the judge and the jury, the defendants typically choose the opposite of what the prosecution would prefer. And the sentence imposed is typically lighter than what prosecutors would have expected from the other body.

Of course, I do no want to suggest the lighter sentences defendants sometimes receive by having the option of choosing between judges and juries is always a bad thing. In some instances, the option of jury sentencing may serve as a check against overly punitive judges. My point is only that the sentencing choice afforded to Texas defendants is a procedural rule that prosecutors almost uniformly dislike and that every other state in the nation, save one, has rejected.

* * *

The discussion in Part II.A through II.H highlights a number of areas in which the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure and the Texas Constitution guarantee significant rights to Texas defendants that they would not receive under the federal Constitution. These protections, while the most significant, are in no way the only pro-defendant guarantees provided to Texas defendants. The 236 See Life at the Harris County Criminal Justice Center, 177th District Court Judicial Race, available at http://harriscountycriminaljustice.blogspot.com/2008/10/177th-district-court-judicial-race.html. (discussing Judge Anderson, in blog maintained by former Assistant District Attorney and current defense attorney, and noting that she was a “tough judge”).

---

237 See Brian Rogers, Real-Life Experience: With the “Four-Horsemen of Addiction” Behind Him, Newly Elected Judge Says He’s Ready, HOUS. CHRON., Nov. 17, 2008.

238 See supra note 231 and accompanying text.
Texas Code of Criminal Procedure also imposes more rigorous requirements for conducting warrantless arrests,239 tighter restrictions on the execution of search warrants,240 a broader right to counsel at probation revocation hearings,241 and a variety of other safeguards not compelled by the federal Constitution.

It is important to be modest in stating the limits of my argument. I am not arguing that Texas has the (or even one of the) most pro-defendant codes of criminal procedure in the nation. I am also not arguing that the criminal procedure protections afforded by the Texas Code are bad public policy. Rather, I am simply making the descriptive observation that Texas is not nearly as tough as its reputation suggests when it comes to criminal procedure.

III. Why is Texas Tough on Crime, But Soft on Criminal Procedure?

Having demonstrated that Texas can be simultaneously tough on crime but generous in its statutory criminal procedure protections, the lingering question is why? After all, it would seem counter-intuitive for a state with a “lock-em-up” mentality to place any unnecessary statutory roadblocks in the way of prosecutors gaining convictions. As explained below, there are a number of explanations why the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure may be protective of criminal defendants. To be clear at the outset, I do not attempt to offer a unifying theory that reconciles all of Texas’s procedural rules with all of its tough-on-crime policies. It may very well be impossible, for instance, to explain why the nation’s most prolific user of capital punishment is the only state that rejects the inevitable discovery doctrine by statute. What I offer below is instead a series of starting points to explain the Texas dichotomy.

A. There Is No Inconsistency Between Being Tough on Crime and Generous on Criminal Procedure

The first explanation for the contradiction between being tough-on-crime and generous on criminal procedure is that there is in fact no contradiction. Texas could choose to give defendants robust procedural protections before finding them guilty, but thereafter punish them harshly for violation of the social compact. Put differently, it is logical to punish harshly when we have afforded defendants vigorous procedural protections and are sure of their guilt. This theory might explain why Texas is willing to endure inefficient practices such as jury trials for traffic infractions and onerous rules for confessions.\textsuperscript{242} It also could explain why the Texas Constitution offers only limited opportunities to deny bail to defendants who have not yet been convicted.\textsuperscript{243} And the theory seems particularly well-suited to Texans who see their state not simply as a location but as a way of life.\textsuperscript{244} An offense against the State of Texas and its citizens – if we are sure you committed it – is a great sin deserving of harsh punishment given how exceptional the state is in the eyes of its citizens.

\[240\) See Tex. Code Crim. Pro. Art. 18.06 (setting time limit of three days, not counting day of issuance or day of execution).

On a very general level, the social compact theory seems to make sense. But the explanation breaks down when applied to certain situations. For instance, while the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure offers run-of-the-mill defendants a series of robust protections, the Texas Code certainly does not go out of its way to protect capital defendants from unjust death sentences.\textsuperscript{245} The Texas death penalty statute is the most pro-prosecution capital punishment scheme in the nation and has long been criticized for offering insufficient procedural protection.\textsuperscript{246} For decades, Texas juries have sentenced inmates to death after inadequate trials and substandard representation.\textsuperscript{247} Texas’s death penalty record therefore makes it difficult to assert that Texas criminal law and procedure is founded on an idea of giving all criminal defendants every benefit of the doubt before punishing them harshly. The social compact argument is also unconvincing when we consider how Texas has occasionally fought payment to exonerated individuals who are entitled to compensation under the State’s wrongfully conviction statute.\textsuperscript{248} In short, while there may be something to the idea that Texas’ toughness follows directly from vigorously protecting procedural rights, the argument has limitations.

B. Texas’s Distrust of Government Power and Its Penchant for Private Ordering May Explain Criminal Procedure Guarantees and Tough Punishments

---

\textsuperscript{242} See supra Parts II.H & II.D.

\textsuperscript{243} See supra Part II.F

\textsuperscript{244} See J.A. Burkhart, Texas, Texans, and Texanism, 9 The Antioch Review 316, 318 (1949).

\textsuperscript{245} See supra Part I.A.

\textsuperscript{247} See, e.g., David R. Dow, Executed on a Technicality: Lethal Injustice on America’s Death Row (2005).

\textsuperscript{248} See, e.g., Harvey Rice, State Rejects Compensation for Wrongly Convicted Man, Hous. Chron., Feb. 14, 2011 (refusing to pay $1.4 million to man wrongfully on death row for eighteen years because the judge’s order dismissing the charges did not specifically say the inmate was innocent).
A second, and slightly more persuasive, argument centers around Texas’s engrained gun culture and its disdain for excessive government interference. Texans believe strongly in gun ownership and the concomitant idea of private ordering. They have no problem with punishing offenders harshly and indeed Texas has a long history of lynching and vigilante justice. But when it comes to government power, Texas has historically been suspicious. While the Texas Rangers have been revered law enforcement figures for over a century, Texans by and large remain skeptical of anything that might be seen as encroaching on individual liberties. This might explain why Texas is unwilling to accept an inevitable discovery exception that excuses illegal conduct by law enforcement officers, a good faith exception allowing for warrants lacking probable cause, or sobriety checkpoints that give police wide authority to stop anyone without suspicion.

250 See WILLIAM P. RUGER & JASON SORENS, FREEDOM IN THE 50 STATES: AN INDEX OF PERSONAL AND ECONOMIC FREEDOM (Mercatus Center, George Mason University 2009) (ranking Texas fifth nationally with respect to fiscal policy, regulation, and paternalism). To name but two prominent anecdotal examples, Texas is home to libertarian hero Ron Paul and was at the forefront of electricity deregulation.

251 See PERKINSON, supra note 43, at 142-43

252 See RANDOLPH B. CAMPBELL, GONE TO TEXAS: A HISTORY OF THE LONE STAR STATE 471 (2003) (discussing Texas’s distinctiveness and explaining that it has “developed an outsized emphasis on many of the qualities and characteristics regarded as being especially American – a fierce devotion to personal liberty, rampant individualism, and admiration for the superrich, for example”); see also id. at 316: (noting that Democrats in charge of state government in the late 1800s “offered the least government possible – one that did what was necessary to protect property and preserve law and order and otherwise kept spending and taxing to a bare minimum’’); id. at 382-92 (describing skepticism of Texans toward big-government New Deal programs).

254 See supra Part I.A.

255 See supra Part I.C.

256 See, e.g., Larry Copeland, Drunk Drivers Push Limits: Hard-Core Offenders Prompt Zero Tolerance, USA TODAY, Dec. 8, 2010, at 3A (noting that efforts to establish sobriety checkpoints in Texas have failed because of resistance from “drunks, people who make money off of drunks, and civil libertarians”).
Texas’s concern about governmental power is in contrast to the deference shown to law enforcement by other states.\textsuperscript{257} To be sure, politicians in other states and in Congress do occasionally enact pro-defendant criminal procedure protections. Yet, as Professor Craig Lerner has shown, this often comes from self-interest or cases where politicians have had personal encounters with law enforcement.\textsuperscript{258} Texas politicians may not fit this mold however because they represent a more libertarian electorate that harbors a greater distrust of police power. Thus, where politicians in other states might be unwilling to vote for criminal procedure protections that would be seen as pro-defendant, Texas politicians may be willing to do so because the vote would be seen as pro-individual liberty.

C. Longstanding Statutory Protections and Short Legislative Sessions May Keep Pro-Defendant Rules on the Books That Would Be Rejected if the Legislature Were Starting From Scratch

A third explanation combines the age of Texas’s statutory protections with the very short legislative sessions in Texas. Some of Texas’s pro-defendant criminal procedure protections were codified a century ago, before the politicization of criminal justice issues.\textsuperscript{259} And while Texas legislators might reap political dividends by repealing these protections today, they simply lack the time to do so because of Texas’s brief legislative session. The Texas legislature meets for only a few months every two years\textsuperscript{260} and there is little time for non-essential bills.\textsuperscript{261} Hence, old laws remain unchanged unless there is an enormous groundswell for revision.

For example, the prohibition on oral confessions was added to the Texas Code in 1907. There is no definitive explanation for what led to its enactment a

\begin{itemize}
\item[257]\textit{See} Anthony G. Amsterdam, \textit{Perspectives on the Fourth Amendment}, 58 MINN. L. REV. 349, 378-79 (1974) (“Legislatures have not been, are not now, and are not likely to become sensitive to the concern of protecting persons under investigation by the police.”).
\item[258]\textit{See} Craig S. Lerner, \textit{Legislators as the “American Criminal Class”: Why Congress (Sometimes) Protects the Rights of Defendants}, 2004 U. ILL. L. REV. 599. As the saying goes, if a conservative is a liberal who has been mugged, a liberal is a conservative who has been indicted. \textit{See id.} at 603-04.
\item[260]\textit{See} Tex. Const. Art. 3, §§ 5(a) & 24 (limiting the legislative session to 140 days every two years).
\item[261]\textit{See}, e.g., Editorial, \textit{Our Turn: Don’t Let Technicalities Torpedo the Worthy Bills}, SAN ANTONIO EXPRESS, May 25, 2007, at 8B (“The Texas Legislature meets for five months every two years. That’s precious little time to take care of state business.”).
\end{itemize}
century ago, but it is clearly unpopular today and ripe for deletion from the Code today. Although the Legislature has considered outrightly repealing the protection a few times in the past, most legislative efforts have not made it out of committee.

The same logic helps to explain why the Code’s restrictive good faith exception and its private actor exclusionary rule have not been jettisoned. Individual legislators have introduced legislation to abolish those protections, but the efforts have never proceeded very far. For example, in 1997 a bill with the sole purpose of eliminating the exclusionary rule for evidence seized illegally by private actors died in committee a month after being introduced. In 1999, a similar bill fared even worse, never even receiving a sub-committee hearing. Multiple bills to expand Texas’s narrow good faith exception have likewise never been reported out of subcommittee.

The explanatory power of the “old rule, busy legislature” theory is limited however. Texas is not the only state with a busy legislature and Texas politicians know just as well as their colleagues in other states that being tough on crime (including eliminating unpopular protections for unpopular defendants) sells well at the ballot box. In short, the theory that limited legislative time

---

262 Scholars cite a case in which a sheriff claimed a prisoner had orally confessed to murder, but it was later discovered that the prisoner only spoke Swedish, which the sheriff clearly did not speak. As Professor Dix has explained, “[w]hether such a case ever occurred and, if so, whether it was the motivating factor for the oral confession statute is uncertain.” Dix, Texas “Confession Law,” supra note 153, at 8

263 See id. at 4 (recounting outraged reaction when a high-profile murder case was overturned due to the oral confession rule).

264 See id. at 13-14.

265 See supra Parts II.B & II.C.

266 See HB 2281, 75th Regular Session: Actions (available at http://www.lrl.state.tx.us/legis/billsearch/advancedSearch.cfm).

269 See Gruber, supra note 259, at 60. Moreover, by eliminating obstacles to convictions, politicians increase the number of felons. The disenfranchisement of these felons in turn reduces the number of progressive voters who might vote against sitting conservative politicians. See id. (“Supporting crime control initiatives is especially rewarding for conservative politicians because increasing felony convictions leads to the disenfranchisement of those who, if they chose to vote, would likely vote for progressive candidates and policies.”).
preserves pro-defendant rules likely explains why less salient criminal procedure protections have not come under attack. But the theory, by itself, is insufficient to explain the continued existence of the most valuable procedural protections (such as the statutory confession rules) guaranteed in the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure.

D. Being Tough on Crime May Provide Cover for Being Generous on Criminal Procedure

A fourth explanation is that Texas’s well-known reputation for being tough on crime eliminates or at least reduces pressure on Texas legislators to curb criminal-procedural protections. Under this explanation, the harsh punishments imposed in Texas leads to its citizens either (1) wrongly assuming that the State is also stingy on criminal procedure protections for defendants; or (2) not being troubled by any beneficial procedural protections because of the sheer magnitude of punishment for those who are convicted. Under either theory, there is less public outrage about pro-defendant protections and less pressure on politicians to eliminate those statutory guarantees.

Once again, there is likely some truth to this argument. Very few citizens (whether from Texas or elsewhere) recognize that the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure contains numerous pro-defendant guarantees. Most observers likely believe that Texas has few if any extra procedural guarantees. And to the extent that observers are aware of pro-defendant rules, they may wrongly attribute them to court decisions, rather than blaming the legislature for them.270

It is important not to take this explanation too far however. As I explained in Part I, Texas is not as tough on crime as it appears. Defendants often receive the lower end of huge sentencing ranges,271 and when tough sentences are meted out they are often reduced by parole.272 More to the point, when defendants receive lighter than expected sentences or when criminal cases fall apart because of procedural problems (such as illegal searches or invalid confessions), the 270 Popular (though not necessarily accurate) criticism of the criminal justice system almost universally lays blame on “activist judges” rather than legislative decisions. See, e.g., Mark R. Levin, Men in Black: How the Supreme Court Is Destroying America (Regnery 2006).

271 See supra notes 71-75 and accompanying text.
272 See supra notes 62-66 and accompanying text.
274 See, e.g., Tanya Eiserer, Prosecutors Seek Dismissal of Drug-Case Charges: Judge Throws Out Evidence, Police Unit Already Under Review, DALLAS MORNING NEWS, March 17, 2009, at 3B (suppressing search premised on consent because police threatened to incarcerate suspect’s wife and place his child with protective services).
news media is all too happy to highlight those cases. Similar news stories abound when accused criminals are granted bail and subsequently flee or commit new crimes. With media attention brought to bare, public backlash is inevitable. Texas politicians, just like their counterparts throughout the nation, therefore campaign as being tough on crime. Once elected, politicians who want to bolster their reputations (and be re-elected) should seemingly look to statutory criminal procedure guarantees as low-hanging fruit to be eliminated. And, in fact, individual legislators have unsuccessfully moved to scale back many of the pro-defendant statutory rules discussed in Part II.

At bottom, Texas reputation for being tough-on-crime likely staves off some public resentment toward favorable criminal procedure guarantees. But, by itself, the perception of Texas’s punitiveness is likely insufficient to explain its favorable Code of Criminal Procedure.

* * *

In the end, there is likely some truth to all four explanations discussed above. Protective criminal procedure protections are not necessarily inconsistent with punishing convicted defendants harshly. And Texas’s historical distrust of governmental power may explain why the Code makes it easier to suppress searches and confessions than other states. To the extent there is public support for eliminating some pro-defendant rules of procedure, entropy and a short legislative session may keep those protections on the books. And perhaps more so than in other states, the universal recognition that Texas is tough on crime may limit public pressure to roll back criminal procedure protections.

Conclusion

When it comes to punishing convicted defendants, Texas Toughness is no myth. Texas is the most prolific user of capital punishment, and it is a national leader in incarceration. From a symbolic standpoint, Texas imposes enormous prison sentences on many offenders and has been at the forefront of the public shaming movement. Texas, simply put, is tough on crime.

276 See supra notes 274-75.

277 See supra note 181-83 and accompanying text.

278 See, e.g., Ian McCann, Challenger Calls Out Madden on Ethics: Incumbent Dismisses Allegations, Says Cole Inexperienced, DALLAS MORNING NEWS, Feb. 28, 2008, at 1B (noting that challenged asserted his opponent was “soft on crime”).

279 See supra notes 125-26, 136, 153-55, 164, 209-09 and accompanying text.

280 See PERKINSON, supra note 43.
Yet, the story of Texas criminal procedure is much more complicated and more pro-defendant than Texas’s general reputation for punitiveness suggests. Texas defendants benefit from a variety of criminal procedure protections that go well beyond what is mandated by the Supreme Court of the United States. And contrary to the tough-on-crime rhetoric of Texas politicians, many of these criminal procedure protections could have been eliminated long ago because they are statutory, rather than judicial, rules. Yet, legislators have declined to repeal the numerous pro-defendant protections found in the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure.

There are a number of possible reasons why Texas continues to retain a generous Code of Criminal Procedure. Distrust of governmental power may explain the continued existence of certain protections against aggressive police tactics, while Texas’s short legislative session may protect less prominent rules from being repealed. In the bigger picture, Texas’s reputation for punitiveness may insulate legislators from pressure to scale back procedural protections. Texans may also see robust procedural protections as essential before punishing offenders for breaking the social compact. In all likelihood, all of these explanations have a role to play in explaining the wide divergence between Texas’s reputation for punitiveness and its generous statutory Code of Criminal Procedure.

The point of this article is not to definitively resolve the reason for the Texas dichotomy. Nor is my goal to encourage legislators to abolish favorable rules of procedure. The aim of this article is to demonstrate that Texas is not nearly as tough on criminal procedure as its reputation suggests.