“The Grass That Gets Trampled When Elephants Fight”: Will the Codification of the Crime of Aggression Protect Women?

Beth Van Schaack, Santa Clara University
“The Grass That Gets Trampled When Elephants Fight”:
Will the Codification of the Crime of Aggression Protect Women?

Beth Van Schaack∗

I. Introduction ............................................................................................................................. 1

II. War is Bad for Women ............................................................................................................ 5

III. Deconstructing The Crime of Aggression ........................................................................... 8

IV. Is The Codification of the Crime of Aggression Good For Women?................................ 16
   A. Jurisdictional Hurdles & State Consent ............................................................................. 16
   B. Definitional Limitations and Advantages .......................................................................... 19
   C. The Crime’s Reach: Collateral Damage ........................................................................... 22
   D. IHL Repercussions ............................................................................................................. 26
   E. The Two Sides of Deterrence ............................................................................................ 30
   F. Chilling Humanitarian Intervention ................................................................................... 32
   G. Intervening on Behalf of Women ....................................................................................... 40
   H. Ending Conflicts ................................................................................................................ 43
   I. Distractions and Detractions .............................................................................................. 45

V. Conclusion............................................................................................................................. 47

I. Introduction

The law struggles to contain violence, whether interpersonal or international. It cannot be gainsaid that there is a gendered component to many forms of violence: most violent crimes are ∗ B.A. Stanford University, J.D. Yale Law School. I served on the United States delegation to the International Criminal Court Review Conference in 2010 in Kampala, Uganda. Needless-to-say, the views expressed herein (and any errors) are entirely my own and do not at all reflect the position of the United States government. All material contained in here is available in the public record or derives from my own notes of the Conference. I am indebted to Diane Marie Amann, Judith Gardam, Susana SáCouto, and Jaya Ramji-Nogales and all of the participants of the “Creation of International Law” conference at the University of Oslo for their valuable comments on this draft. My sincere thanks also go to Adam Birnbaum, Martin Guerbadot, and Nicola Gladitz for their expert research assistance and to Mary Sexton for her valuable and tireless assistance gathering materials. Some of this research is also featured in the series on the crime of aggression on IntLawGrrls, http://intlawgrrls.blogspot.com/search/label/Crime%20of%20aggression%20series.

committed by men\textsuperscript{1} and most armed conflicts are initiated\textsuperscript{2} and fought by men.\textsuperscript{3} This is not to say, of course, that women are not responsible for violence as criminals,\textsuperscript{4} combatants,\textsuperscript{5} terrorists,\textsuperscript{6} or as aiding, abettors, enablers, or supporters. Indeed, over the years,\textsuperscript{7} a handful of women have

\textsuperscript{1}The crime statistics for perpetrators of assault, serious assault, rape, and homicide compiled by the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe bear this claim out. See http://w3.unece.org/pxweb/DATABASE/STAT/30-GE/07-CV/07-CV.asp. See also similar statistics by the U.S. Department of Justice, http://bjs.ojp.usdoj.gov/content/pub/pdf/cvus/previous/cvus38.pdf

\textsuperscript{2}Women serve as heads of state of seventeen countries, most recently in Slovakia. Through the years, only seventy women from more than fifty countries have been elected or appointed to serve as president, prime minister, or chancellor. See Equal Representation in Government, http://ergd.org/Premiers.htm; Female World Leaders Currently in Power, http://www.filibustercartoons.com/charts_rest_female-leaders.php; Worldwide Guide to Women in Leadership, Woman Elected or Appointed Heads of State and Government, http://www.guide2womenleaders.com/Female_Leaders.htm. To date, about sixty-five women have served as Minister of Defense. See Worldwide Guide to Women in Leadership, Female Ministers of Defense, http://www.guide2womenleaders.com/Defense_ministers.htm. To be sure, nations led by women have resorted to armed force. To provide just two examples, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher launched the Falklands War after Argentina invaded the islands, and Indira Gandhi was Prime Minister during the 1971 wars that resulted in the formation of Bangladesh. See Linda Malone, \textit{Woman and War}, 12 \textit{WILLIAM & MARY J. OF WOMEN & LAW} 297, 297 (2005-6) (“The historical prominence of Golde Meir, Indira Gandhi, Margaret Thatcher, Condoleezza Rice or … Madeleine Albright only accentuates how women with such power are few and far between.”).

\textsuperscript{3}In the United States, about 14% of military personnel are women. Women In Military Service For America Memorial Foundation, \textit{Statistics on Women in the Military}, http://www.womensmemorial.org/PDFs/StatsonWIM.pdf. Women are under-represented in the most senior ranks in the officer and noncommissioned officer corps. Only eleven percent of women in the British armed forces are officers. Ministry of Defense, \textit{Fact Sheet}, http://www.mod.uk/defenceinternet/factsheets/womeninthearmedforces.htm. Even in the Israeli military, one of the few that conscripts women, “[w]omen account for less than 5% of the senior ranks.” CBS News, \textit{Women in the Military — International} (May 30, 2006), http://www.cbc.ca/news/background/military-international/. It was only in 1993 that Sheila Widnall was appointed U.S. Secretary of the Air Force—the first women to lead a branch of the U.S. military. In most national militaries, women are by law excluded from certain combat functions. On this point, the military is one sector of society that has remained steadfastly impervious to demands for formal equality (although in light of the evolution of modern warfare, this is an area where \textit{de facto} equality is ahead of \textit{de jure} equality). But see Navy Welcomes Women to Serve in Submarines, http://www.navy.mil/search/display.asp?story_id=52990 (announcing February 2010 policy change in the U.S. Navy allowing women to serve on submarines). See generally ELIZABETH LUTES HILLMAN: DEFENDING AMERICA: MILITARY CULTURE AND THE COLD WAR COURT—MARTIAL (2005) (discussing the evolving roles of women in the military).

\textsuperscript{4}See \textsuperscript{supra} note ___ (providing domestic statistics).

\textsuperscript{7}In the Nuremberg era, for example, Dr. Herte Oberheuser was a defendant in the so-called Doctor’s Trial, which was brought under Control Council Law No. 10 and focused on charges involving nonconsensual medical experimentation and the euthanistic extermination of patients. See \textit{United States v. Brandt, et al.}, Indictment, available at http://www.loc.gov/rr/frd/Military_Law/pdf/NT_Indictments.pdf. See \textit{also} Diane Marie Amann, been prosecuted for the commission of international crimes. But, when a woman ends up dead, maimed, or battered, it is most likely at the hands of a man, be it a family member, community member, or military opponent.

The baseline vulnerability of women is enhanced in situations of armed conflict. Even today, when such conduct is clearly unlawful under international humanitarian law, violence against women is often employed as a deliberate “tactic of war to humiliate, dominate, instill fear in, disperse and/or forcibly relocate civilian members of a community or ethnic group.” In a series of landmark resolutions, the United Nations Security Council recognized that violence against women in situations of armed conflict—a phenomenon that has reached pandemic proportions and “appalling levels of brutality”—is an issue of international peace and security within the Council’s purview. Maj. Gen. Patrick Cammaert, a former U.N. peacekeeping commander, testified before the Council in 2008 that “[i]t has probably become more dangerous to be a woman than a soldier in an armed conflict.”

Although the law historically overlooked gender-based violence, international criminal law now penalizes many forms of violence against women when it rises to the level of war crimes, crimes against humanity, or genocide and gender has become a central part of any discussion about the impact of international criminal justice. The most recent addition to the pantheon of international offenses is the crime of aggression. Representatives from the international community have just completed marathon negotiations over a definition of the crime of aggression to be inserted in the Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC), completing a task that the original drafters of the treaty were unable to accomplish the first time.

12 Id. Resolution 1820 followed on the heels of Resolution 1325—the most important Council resolution on women, peace and security—to focus more concretely on sexual violence as an issue of international security. See generally Sam Cook, Security Council Resolution 1820: On Militarism, Flashlights, Raincoats, And Rooms With Doors—A Political Perspective On Where It Came From And What It Adds, 23 EMORY INT’L L. REV. 125 (2009). It was followed by Resolution 1888, which mandates that peacekeeping missions protect women and girls from sexual violence and better integrate a gender perspective in their operations. S.C. Res. 1888 (2009), http://www.un.org/News/Press/docs/2009/sc9753.doc.htm.

around and with which the international community has been struggling for decades.\textsuperscript{15} The aggression negotiations focused on two major issues: a definition of the crime and a jurisdictional regime to enable its prosecution. The latter issue turned on what role, if any, the Security Council would play in any prosecution for aggression in light of its central role in responding to threats to and breaches of the peace under the United Nations Charter system. Both issues proved to be contentious, on their own and in their interaction. In May and June 2010, delegations from ICC states parties, as well as many observer states and non-governmental organizations, converged in Kampala, Uganda, to complete the negotiations. Those in attendance succeeded in adopting a definition of the crime of aggression with several important understandings. Significant progress was made on the jurisdictional regime, but delegates left the operationalization of the crime to a future decision of the Assembly of States Parties to take place no sooner than 2017.

This article analyzes the outcome of the Kampala process with an eye toward the rarely-considered gender aspects of the crime of aggression, whether or not the provisions adopted represent an advancement for women, and how aspects of feminist theory might interpret the new regime.\textsuperscript{16} Any impact of the provisions will inevitably be limited by gaps and ambiguities in the definition of the crime and the jurisdictional regime, which is premised on state consent and exempts non-states parties altogether. These compromises on definitional precision and jurisdictional comprehensiveness were instrumental in achieving consensus in Kampala. The insertion of the crime of aggression in the Rome Statute such as it is fills what many perceived as a lacuna in international criminal law that has existed since the World War II era. It enables the prosecution of a wider range of acts, and actors, that cause harm to women and makes actionable harm to women that may not rise to the level of war crimes or crimes against humanity and that has historically been rendered juridically invisible by the collateral damage euphemism. The option to grant amnesty for the crime also suggests a unique utility when international negotiators must balance the competing imperatives of peace and justice.

At the same time, indirect negative effects may flow from the interaction of the Court’s potential to prosecute the crime of aggression and the long-standing \textit{jus in bello}, that body of rules governing how war is waged rather than why war is waged, which is the purview of the \textit{jus ad bellum}. By penalizing the resort to armed force, the threat of prosecution of the crime of aggression may undermine incentives to comply with key doctrines within international humanitarian law that serve to protect civilians and other vulnerable groups. It also remains to be seen whether the codification of the crime of aggression will serve any deterrent purpose whatsoever when governmental leaders contemplate using force—offensively or defensively—in their international relations, especially in situations that do not implicate exigent sovereign threats. To the extent that the new provisions do exert a restraining effect, the expansive way in which the crime has been defined may end up chilling those uses of force that are protective and thus more discretionary, such as uses of force employed pursuant to the nascent doctrine of responsibility to protect. The crime may thus result in more \textit{ex post} prosecutions at the expense of ex ante efforts at preventing and repressing violence.\(^\text{17}\) Whether this over-deterrence argument should be raised on behalf of women, however, requires an acceptance of the legitimacy, if not lawfulness, of humanitarian intervention with or without Security Council approval and a coming to terms with a certain valorization of militarism and its inherent masculinities—a perspective that is alien to much feminist thinking.\(^\text{18}\)

\textsuperscript{15} Resolution RC/Res.6, The Crime of Aggression (June 11, 2010), available at http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/Resolutions/RC-Res.6-ENG.pdf [herein after “Resolution RC/Res.6”].

\textsuperscript{16} Katharine T. Bartlett, \textit{Feminist Legal Methods}, 103 HARV. L. REV. 829, 836, 837 (1990) (advocating that feminists ask “the woman question” to “expose how the substance of law may silently and without justification submerge the perspectives of women and other excluded groups” and to “identify the gender implications of rules and practices which might otherwise appear to be neutral or objective.”).

The International Criminal Court (ICC) has yet to demonstrate that it can fulfill its current mandate. Operationalizing the crime of aggression without allocating additional resources to enable the Court to prosecute this controversial, largely unprecedented,\(^\text{19}\) and qualitatively different crime may distract the Court from responding more effectively to the “atrocity crimes” that now finally address gender-based violence more directly. The crime may also encourage the Court to focus on leaders in capital cities rather than the warlords next door, whom victims more directly associate with atrocities and without whose prosecution it may be impossible to achieve complete justice for women. Given the potential to reach top political leaders, the crime may be also subject to abuse. The amendments approved in Kampala will eventually permit states parties to refer each other to the ICC as alleged violators of the prohibition against aggression. Misuse of this referral authority could render the Court little more than just another forum for states to manipulate and exploit in order to advance their interests. Such an outcome would politicize and de-legitimate the Court.

At this early stage in the life of the Court and in the absence of any concrete experience investigating or prosecuting the new crime of aggression, these bases for criticism and praise are inherently speculative. Applying a feminist perspective to the codification of the crime of aggression yields no easy conclusions. Rather, reasoning through the central question of whether the codification of the crime in the ICC Statute will be good for women produces a dizzying spiral of dialectical reasoning. As a feminist,\(^\text{20}\) I thus approach the crime with a profound ambivalence.

II. War is Bad for Women

It goes without saying that conflict conditions are almost uniformly bad for women and harm women in particular gender-specific ways.\(^\text{21}\) The precise manifestations of harm may differ

\(^\text{18}\) See, e.g., SARA RUDDICK, MATERNAL THINKING TOWARDS A POLITICS OF PEACE 141-159 (1995); id. at xviii-xx (discussing potential for nonviolent action in the face of atrocities). But see infra note ___ (citing authorities that challenge the link between feminism and pacifism).

\(^\text{19}\) Despite the centrality of crimes against the peace in the post-WWII proceedings, none of the post-Cold War international tribunals included the crime of aggression within its subject matter jurisdiction, even though the crime was arguably relevant to the Yugoslavian, Sierra Leonean, and East Timorese contexts, at a minimum. Only the Statute of the Iraqi High Tribunal includes an aggression-like prohibition drawn from domestic law. As a pan-Arabist gesture, Article 14 renders the following crime prosecutable: “The abuse of position and the pursuit of policies that were about to lead to the threat of war or the use of the armed forces of Iraq against an Arab country, in accordance with Article 1 of Law Number 7 of 1958.” Iraqi High Criminal court Law, available at http://law.case.edu/saddamtrial/documents/lst_statute_official_english.pdf. Saddam Hussein was executed before any Kuwait-related charges against him could either be lodged or adjudicated.

\(^\text{20}\) Bartlett, supra note ___, at 833 (defining a feminist approach as one that adopts “a self-consciously critical stance toward the existing order with respect to the various ways it affects different women ‘as women.’”).

\(^\text{21}\) My goal here is not to engage in “competitive vulnerability” by suggesting that women uniformly suffer more than men in conflict, but to think about the impact of war on women as a distinct phenomenon of any armed conflict.
according to the particulars of history and culture. Civilian casualties in war have grown exponentially over time, driven largely by a multitude of factors: increases in the destructive potential of military technology; the prevalence and intensification of air warfare; the proliferation of small arms; the increase in non-international armed conflicts that are no longer confined to formal battle lines but rather extend deeply into civilian communities; and the concomitant prevalence of irregular and undisciplined fighters, who receive little training in the law or practice of war and are not subject to a rigorous chain of command. The harrowing statistics of civilian deaths in modern warfare merely hint at the suffering experienced by non-combatants in war. While women are harmed alongside men when civilians are the direct or indirect targets of violence, women experience armed conflict and repression in ways that are different from men. “Women,” as Catharine A. MacKinnon has written “are violated in ways that men are not, or rarely are.”

Indeed, it is now widely accepted that women will be subjected to gender-based and sexual violence in war. For most of human history, the rape and sexual abuse of women

See Hilary Charlesworth, Are Women Peaceful? Reflections on the Role of Women in Peace-Building, 16 FEMINIST LEGAL STUDIES 347, 358 (2008) (critiquing view that women suffer more in conflict and have more to gain with peace). See also Laura Shepherd, GENDER, VIOLENCE AND SECURITY 116 (2008) (arguing that the claim that women suffer in war more than men is both counter-productive and empirically unverifiable).

See S.C. Res. 1265 (1999) (“Noting that civilians account for the vast majority of casualties in armed conflicts and are increasingly targeted by combatants and armed elements, gravely concerned by the hardships borne by civilians during armed conflict, in particular as a result of acts of violence directed against them, especially women, children and other vulnerable groups, including refugees and internally displaced persons, and recognizing the consequent impact this will have on durable peace, reconciliation and development.”). For compiled statistics on deaths in the 20th century’s wars, see Death Tolls For Major Wars and Atrocities in the Twentieth Century, http://users.erols.com/mwhite28/warstat2.htm.

Catharine A. MacKinnon, Crimes of War, Crimes of Peace, in ON HUMAN RIGHTS: THE OXFORD AMNESTY LECTURES 1993 83, 85 (Stephen Shute and Susan Hurley eds., 1993). See also Charlotte Lindsey, The Impact of Armed Conflict on Women, in LISTENING TO THE SILENCES: WOMEN AND WAR (Helen Durham and Tracey Gurd, eds., 2005) and Judith Gardam and Michelle Jarvis, WOMEN, ARMED CONFLICT AND INTERNATIONAL LAW, Ch. 2 (2001). But see Lara Stemple, Male Rape and Human Rights, 60 HASTINGS L. J. 605 (2009) (discussing invisibility of sexual violence committed against men); Shepherd, supra note ___, at 115 (noting that the attention made to women victims overshadows the extent to which men are also the victims of sexual violence).

For example, a World Health Organization study in Liberia revealed that 75 percent of women surveyed were raped during that country’s civil war. World Health Organization, Marie-Claire O. Omanyondo, Sexual Gender-Based Violence And Health Facility Needs Assessment (Montserrado And Bong Counties) Liberia (Sept. 6 - 21, 2004), http://www.who.int/hac/crises/lbr/Liberia_GBV_2004_FINAL.pdf. Statistics suggest that 40,000 women were raped during war in Bosnia and Herzegovina in early 1990s. In Sierra Leone, combatants sexually assaulted between 50,000-64,000 internally displaced women in Sierra Leone. See U.N. Family Planning Association, Sexual associated with the enemy was an expected spoil, inevitable by-product, or legitimate tactic of war.\textsuperscript{28} Such acts are now subject to prosecution before international and domestic tribunals as war crimes and crimes against humanity, but they continue unabated in today’s armed conflicts.\textsuperscript{29} In conflicts of all kinds, but especially those motivated by nationalism or ethnic animosity, women may experience multiple and intersectional forms of gender- and identity-based violence by virtue of being perceived as idealized symbols of a people or repositories of culture.\textsuperscript{30} Such attacks on women work violence at two levels—that of the individual victim and that of the collective to which the victim belongs. By exemplifying the debility and subjugation of a society’s male protectors,\textsuperscript{31} such attacks may exacerbate conflicts and instigate gender-based retaliation.\textsuperscript{32}

Violence against women in war does not come only from military opponents. In wars of liberation, women may join, or be forcibly conscripted into, rebel armies in which they may serve as combatants, domestic servants, spies, sexual slaves, and “bush wives.”\textsuperscript{33} History has shown that peacekeepers are not necessarily the protectors they are deployed to be.\textsuperscript{34} In addition, women often experience the time of war as an extension of a pre-existing “peacetime” continuum of violence in which they experience wrongs such as intimate violence, sexual harassment, and other forms of private or communal violence.\textsuperscript{35} Many forms of this everyday \textsuperscript{30} Such wars of liberation are rarely liberating for women, especially when women are asked to subordinate their demands to the demands of their polity. \textit{See generally} Christine Chinkin, \textit{A Gendered Perspective to the International Use of Force}, 12 AUSTR. Y.B. INT’L L. 279, 285 (1988-98).

\textsuperscript{31} Brownmiller, \textit{supra} note _, at _ (noting that the “body of a raped women becomes a ceremonial battlefield, a parade ground for the victor’s troop of the colors. The act that is played out upon her [is] vivid proof of victory for one and loss and defeat for the other.”).

\textsuperscript{32} Doris Buss, \textit{Rethinking Rape as a Weapon of War}, 17 FEM. LEG. STUDIES 145, 148 (2009) [hereinafter \textit{Buss, Rethinking’’}] (noting that the reciprocal rapes in war constitute a message passed between men of victory and defeat).

\textsuperscript{33} For a study in Liberia, see Kirsten Johnson, et al., \textit{Association of Combatant Status and Sexual Violence With Health and Mental Health Outcomes in Postconflict Liberia}, 300, J. AM. MED. ASSOC. 676 (2008), available at http://jama.ama-assn.org/cgi/content/full/300/6/676 (noting that a third of former combatants were women, one fourth of which participated in combat).

\textsuperscript{34} \textit{See also} S.C. Res. 1888 (2009) (calling for more women to be deployed in peacekeeping operations).

violent behavior are exacerbated in wartime. When societies are under stress, the rule of law—such as it was—is shattered. Cruelty becomes normalized if not legitimated. These multifarious sources of violence against women hold entire communities hostage and prevent women’s full access to schools, markets, social services, and other necessities of life.

It must not be overlooked that war harms women in nonviolent ways too. Militarism in general—and war in particular—consumes resources that might otherwise go to different priorities of the state: education, healthcare, and improving the societal infrastructure. As detailed in a recent study of gender and war, some women may enjoy some economic benefits during a conflict. For example, in the mythic tradition of Rosie the Riveter, they may be invited to fill positions vacated by men. Yet women—due to their second class citizenship and lack of enforceable legal rights—cannot fully capitalize on the black and grey markets that replace formal markets in war. Moreover, they are often reduced to camp followers to survive, dependent on false and temporary conflict economies that offer marginalized employment as cooks, housekeepers, and runners. These employers and co-belligerents frequently extract paid or unpaid sexual exploitation.

The aftermath of armed conflicts does not necessarily bring relief. Women and their children make up the majority of refugees and internally displaced persons, many of whom are fleeing the world’s armed conflicts. Once some measure of peace is achieved, women are often pushed into or back into traditional gender roles in a collective effort to return to a condition of “normalcy” (unless of course they are ostracized for having been raped or for their affiliation with combatants during the war). Levels of gender-based violence may remain high in the immediate post-conflict situation as combatants are demobilized and resocialized to conditions of peace and as men reassert the patriarchal control mechanisms that may have eroded or been suspended during the conflict. As the African proverb entitled this piece suggests, war—its destructiveness, its culture of hypermasculinity, and its deep societal consequences—is bad for women.

III. Deconstructing The Crime of Aggression

37 Chinkin, supra note ___, at 255.
38 Cook, supra note ___, at 128.
39 Charlesworth & Chinkin, supra note ___, at 166.
40 Cahn & Ní Aoláin, supra note ___.
41 Id. at 3.
43 Women represent very close to half of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees “persons of concern”, which includes refugees, internally displaced persons, and stateless persons. Forty-five percent are children. UNHCR, 2009 GLOBAL TRENDS: REFUGEES, ASYLUM-SEEKERS, RETURNEES, INTERNALLY DISPLACED AND STATELESS PERSONS 14 (June 15, 2010).
44 Kimberly Theidon, Reconstructing Masculinities: The Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration of Former Combatants in Colombia, 31 HUM. RTS. Q. 1 (2009); Cahn & Ní Aoláin, supra note ___ at 18 n.47.
Against this truism that war is bad for women comes the crime of aggression and its complex jurisdictional regime. The part provides the basic contours of the new amendments to the ICC Statute. This material will serve as the basis for the gender analysis that follows.

The definition of the crime of aggression will be inserted within the Rome Statute as Article 8bis, just following the war crimes provisions that comprise Article 8. The crime has been defined as follows:

Article 8 bis

Crime of aggression

1. For the purpose of this Statute, “crime of aggression” means the planning, preparation, initiation or execution, by a person in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State, of an act of aggression which, by its character, gravity and scale, constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.

2. For the purpose of paragraph 1, “act of aggression” means the use of armed force by a State against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of another State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations. Any of the following acts, regardless of a declaration of war, shall, in accordance with United Nations General Assembly resolution 3314 (XXIX) of 14 December 1974, qualify as an act of aggression.

The definition then goes on to provide a list of “acts of aggression” (such as invasion, bombardment etc.) that are drawn verbatim from Article 3 of General Assembly Resolution

---

46 The aggression amendments have been denominated Article 8bis (definition), Articles 15bis and 15ter (jurisdiction), and Article 25(3) (the leadership clause). All other Articles referenced herein appear within the ICC Statute as adopted at Rome in 1998.

47 The Elements of Crimes are as follows:

1. The perpetrator planned, prepared, initiated or executed an act of aggression.
2. The perpetrator was a person in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of the State which committed the act of aggression.
3. The act of aggression—the use of armed force by a State against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of another State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations—was committed.
4. The perpetrator was aware of the factual circumstances that established that such a use of armed force was inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations.
5. The act of aggression, by its character, gravity and scale, constituted a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.
6. The perpetrator was aware of the factual circumstances that established such a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.

48 These acts are:

(a) The invasion or attack by the armed forces of a State of the territory of another State, or any military occupation, however temporary, resulting from such invasion or attack, or any annexation by the use of force of the territory of another State or part thereof;

(b) Bombardment by the armed forces of a State against the territory of another State or the use of any weapons by a State against the territory of another State;
3314\textsuperscript{49} drafted in 1974 to guide the Security Council in determining, in accordance with the Charter, the existence of an act of aggression.\textsuperscript{50} The definition of the crime of aggression and its jurisdictional regime contain several notable features in need of a careful deconstruction. This descriptive material will serve as the basis for the gendered analysis that follows.

The amendment to the Rome Statute that drafters designated Article 8bis defines two phenomena—a crime of aggression, set out in subsection 1 of the Article, and an act of aggression, set out in subsection 2. These two inquiries are considered in reverse order. The act of aggression committed by a state serves as a predicate for the prosecution of an individual for the crime of aggression. Thus, an individual will be held liable when he or she plans, prepares, initiates, or executes one or more acts of aggression through the machinery of a state. The enumerated acts of aggression reflect their historical origins. Absent are acts that might be considered contemporary forms of aggression, such as embargos, cyber attacks or deliberately inflicted environmental degradation, although such acts may be assimilated into the provisions adopted. In the negotiations, the need to prove an act of state in connection with an aggression prosecution gave rise to extensive negotiations over which body—the Security Council, the General Assembly, the International Court of Justice, or the Court itself—would be empowered to make the predicate determination.

In the end, delegates adopted a two-tiered filter structure for undertaking this determination that depends on the source of the referral of the matter. When an investigation is triggered either by a State Party referral or by the Prosecutor acting \textit{proprio motu}, pursuant to Articles 13(a) and (c) of the Statute respectively, the crime will be subject to two filters operating in tandem.\textsuperscript{51} Pursuant to the new Article 15bis(6), the Prosecutor will first determine whether the

\begin{itemize}
\item[(c)] The blockade of the ports or coasts of a State by the armed forces of another State;
\item[(d)] An attack by the armed forces of a State on the land, sea or air forces, or marine and air fleets of another State;
\item[(e)] The use of armed forces of one State which are within the territory of another State with the agreement of the receiving State, in contravention of the conditions provided for in the agreement or any extension of their presence in such territory beyond the termination of the agreement;
\item[(f)] The action of a State in allowing its territory, which it has placed at the disposal of another State, to be used by that other State for perpetrating an act of aggression against a third State;
\item[(g)] The sending by or on behalf of a State of armed bands, groups, irregulars or mercenaries, which carry out acts of armed force against another State of such gravity as to amount to the acts listed above, or its substantial involvement therein.
\end{itemize}

\textsuperscript{49} Other aspects of that Resolution are not reproduced in the aggression amendments, such as the recognition that aggression constitutes the “most serious and dangerous form of the illegal use of force” (Preamble) and the Security Council may decline to declare an act of aggression notwithstanding the commission of an enumerated act (Article 2).

\textsuperscript{50} In 1967, the General Assembly delegated the task of defining aggression to a U.N. Special Committee on the Question of Defining Aggression, which was composed of 35 members chosen for their geographic and legal diversity. It took seven sessions of the Special Committee for the Committee to come up with a consensus definition that it could recommend to the General Assembly for adoption. Resolution 3314 was adopted by consensus, an amazing feat given its Cold War provenance.

\textsuperscript{51} Article 15bis of Resolution RC/Res.6 reads:

1. The Court may exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with article 13, paragraphs (a) and (c), subject to the provisions of this article. …
Security Council has made a determination as to whether the putative aggressor state has committed an act of aggression. If so, the Prosecutor will be entitled to include aggression charges in the indictment pursuant to Article 15bis(7) of the amendments. The Security Council’s determination is not binding on the Court, which will determine the existence of an act of aggression anew under the terms of the Statute and the beyond-reasonable-doubt burden of proof. The Council’s determination, however, will undoubtedly exert a considerable evidentiary pull at trial. If, on the other hand, the Council has not made the necessary determination in six months, the Prosecutor can request permission from the Pre-Trial Division (composed of all the pre-trial judges) to bring such charges pursuant to the new Article 15bis(8). This request is subject to the procedures set out in Article 15 of the Statute—the same provision that governs the Prosecutor’s request to launch an investigation proprio motu. Investigations triggered by the Security Council pursuant to Article 13(b) are not subject to any filter within Article 15ter of the amendments. Following the activation of any of the three trigger mechanisms, the Security Council may exercise authority under Article 16 of the Rome Statute and adopt a resolution, pursuant to Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter, to defer the case for a renewable period of one year.

The crime of aggression may not be prosecuted pursuant to a state referral or proprio motu investigation in situations involving non-states parties. According to Article 15bis(5): “In respect of a State that is not a party to this Statute, the Court shall not exercise its jurisdiction over the crime of aggression when committed by that State’s nationals or on its territory.” Arguably, this blanket exclusion applies to both aggressor and aggressed states. In addition, pursuant to Article 15bis(4), states parties can choose to opt out of the aggression provisions prior to their ratification or acceptance of the aggression amendments.

Article 8bis(2) is worded in such a way that an “act of aggression” encompasses any violation of the territorial integrity, political independence, or sovereignty of another state as

---

6. Where the Prosecutor concludes that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation in respect of a crime of aggression, he or she shall first ascertain whether the Security Council has made a determination of an act of aggression committed by the State concerned. The Prosecutor shall notify the Secretary-General of the United Nations of the situation before the Court, including any relevant information and documents.

7. Where the Security Council has made such a determination, the Prosecutor may proceed with the investigation in respect of a crime of aggression.

8. Where no such determination is made within six months after the date of notification, the Prosecutor may proceed with the investigation in respect of a crime of aggression, provided that the Pre-Trial Division has authorized the commencement of the investigation in respect of a crime of aggression in accordance with the procedure contained in article 15, and the Security Council has not decided otherwise in accordance with article 16.

---

52 Resolution RC/Res.6, Article 15bis(9) (“A determination of an act of aggression by an organ outside the Court shall be without prejudice to the Court’s own findings under this Statute.”).

53 ICC Statute, Article 66.

54 That provision reads: “The Court may, in accordance with article 12, exercise jurisdiction over a crime of aggression, arising from an act of aggression committed by a State Party, unless that State Party has previously declared that it does not accept such jurisdiction by lodging a declaration with the Registrar. The withdrawal of such a declaration may be effected at any time and shall be considered by the State Party within three years.”

55 Resolution RC/Res.6, Article 8bis(2) (defining “act of aggression” as “the use of armed force by a State against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of another State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations”).

11
well as any use of armed force that is inconsistent with the U.N. Charter. Accordingly, the mere crossing of an international border by military forces without the consent of the neighboring state, for example, could be condemned an “act of aggression” regardless of the circumstances, the consequences of the state’s actions, or the motive or intent behind the operation. Such an act could then serve as the predicate to a prosecution for the “crime of aggression,” if the act satisfies the requirements set forth in Article 8bis(1). Although the statutory language is quite broad, and makes no express reference to codified or uncodified exceptions to the Charter’s prohibition on the use of armed force, the new Elements of Crime for aggression clarify that only breaches of the Charter constitute acts of aggression.

The crime of aggression is subject to a leadership clause, which provides that only those individuals occupying the top policy-making echelons of a military or civilian hierarchy can be prosecuted for the crime of aggression. Foot soldiers will not be subject to such charges before the ICC; however, they can still be prosecuted pursuant to Article 8 of the Rome Statute, for any war crimes committed in connection with an act of aggression. A footnote to the corresponding Elements of Crimes makes clear that more than one person may be criminally liable for a crime of aggression.

---

56 This language, with the exception of the added reference to “sovereignty” and the deletion of the concept of a threat to the peace, is drawn from Article 2(4) of the U.N. Charter (“All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations.”).

57 Although it may be argued that the reference to consistency with the Charter might preserve the possibility of a bona fide humanitarian intervention or act of self-defense, the “any other manner” language technically qualifies “the use of armed force” and not “sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence.” This “any other manner” language thus appears to broaden, rather than narrow, the prohibition contained in both Articles 2(4) of the Charter and Article 8bis.

58 The fourth element of the crime of aggression dictates that “The perpetrator was aware of the factual circumstances that established that such a use of armed force was inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations.” Resolution RC/Res.6 at 5.

59 A similar approach was taken in the post-WWII period when tribunals convicted only those individuals at the policy-making level. See, e.g., United States v. Von Leeb (The High Command Case), 11 TRIALS OF WAR CRIMINALS BEFORE THE NUERNBERG MILITARY TRIBUNALS UNDER CONTROL COUNCIL LAW NO. 10 462, 488 (1949) (holding that defendants must “be in a position to shape or influence the policy that brings about [the] initiation or … continuation” of an aggressive war). This excluded “commanders and staff officers below the policy level responsible for planning campaigns, preparing means for carrying them out, moving against a country on orders and fighting a war after it has been instituted.” Id. at 490-91. Individuals deemed “policy makers” included civilian industrials with considerable influence over the government. United States v. Krauch (I.G. Farben), 8 TRIALS OF WAR CRIMINALS BEFORE THE NUERNBERG MILITARY TRIBUNALS UNDER CONTROL COUNCIL LAW NO. 10 1081, 1124-5 (1949) (“To depart from the concept that only major war criminals—that is, those persons in the political, military and industrial fields, for example, who were responsible for the formulation and execution of policies—may be held liable for waging wars of aggression, would lead far afield. Under such circumstances there could be no practical limitation on criminal responsibility that would not include, on principle, the private soldier on the battlefield, the farmer who increased his production of foodstuffs to sustain the armed forces…”).

60 The following text will be inserted after article 25, paragraph 3 of the Statute:

3 bis. In respect of the crime of aggression, the provisions of this article shall apply only to persons in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State.

The Rome Statute abrogates all immunities at Article 27.
particular act of aggression. The crime of aggression will be subject to all the forms of responsibility set forth in Article 25.

In terms of mens rea, according to the Elements of Crimes, the first element of the crime is a conduct element subject to a heightened mental state of intent. Subsequent circumstantial elements, such as the defendant’s occupation of a leadership position, are subject to a lower mental state, that of knowledge. By the terms of Article 30(3) of the Rome Statute, knowledge “means awareness that a circumstance exists or a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events.” This formulation seems to exclude a constructive knowledge, or “should have known,” standard. The elements of the crime encompassing the commission of an act of aggression in manifest violation of the Charter is subject to “knowledge of fact” mental state, which requires a showing that the defendant was aware of the factual circumstances that rendered the applicable state’s use of force inconsistent with the U.N. Charter (e.g., the occurrence of an armed attack against another state, the absence of Security Council authorization, and the absence of a prior attack by the putative victim state). The perpetrator is not required to have knowledge of the precise legal doctrines governing uses of force.

Like General Assembly Resolution 3314, which preceded it, various draft definitions of the crime of aggression were consistently state-centric; specifically, they envisioned aggression as a phenomenon of states, formal military organizations, and international borders. That said, one of the amendments adopted at Kampala, Article 8bis(2)(g), may facilitate prosecutions for aggression in ostensibly non-international conflicts by designating the sending armed bands into another state to carry out acts of armed force as a prosecutable act of aggression. In addition, although the amendments do not address the question directly, it is foreseeable that standard principles of attribution and state responsibility could be applied in a way that extends the reach of the prohibition and satisfies the jurisdictional precondition of state action.

Not every act of aggression will support a prosecution for the crime of aggression. Rather, only those acts of aggression that by their “character, gravity and scale” constitute a “manifest violation” of the Charter, viewed objectively, can give rise to the crime of aggression. The term “manifest,” which was never defined, emerged as a compromise term to bridge the gap between two camps. In the first camp were delegates who wanted no threshold at 61 Footnote 1 reads: “With respect to an act of aggression, more than one person may be in a position that meets these criteria.” Resolution RC/Res.6, supra note __.

---

62 Although there had been some discussion about identifying separate forms of responsibility applicable only to the crime of aggression, this proposal was not pursued. See Keith A. Petty, Sixty Years In The Making: The Definition of Aggression for the International Criminal Court, 31 HASTINGS INT’L & COMP. L. REV. 531, 548-9 (2008) (recounting forms of responsibility options).
63 A similar knowledge-of-fact formulation is contained in Article 8 of the ICC Statute (war crimes), which clarifies that it need not be shown that the defendant undertook a legal evaluation as to the existence of an armed conflict, its classification as international or non-international, or the status of the victims as protected persons. See Elements of Crime, U.N. Doc. No. ICC-ASP/1/3(part II-B) (Sept. 9, 2002), http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/9CAEE830-38CF-41D6-AB0B-68E5F9082543/0/Element_of_Crimes_English.pdf.
64 See infra note __ (discussing applicable standards).
65 The Elements of the Crime of Aggressions state: “The term ‘manifest’ is an objective qualification.” See Annex II, Resolution RC/Res.6.
all, on either the theory that every act of aggression should be subject to prosecution or the theory that the Statute already applied only to “the most serious crimes of international concern.” In the second camp were delegates who wanted a higher threshold than signified by the term “manifest;” that is, they wanted to limit prosecutions to “flagrant” breaches of the Charter, wars of aggression, “unlawful” uses of force, or acts of aggression geared toward occupying or annexing territory.

The term “manifest” was perennially controversial during the negotiations in light of its ambiguity of meaning: to some, the word referred to the degree of legal clarity or ambiguity surrounding the illegality of the act of aggression; to others, the word denoted some level of seriousness (in terms of the impugned act’s scale or consequences) or willfulness. These semantic debates in turn revealed conflicting goals underlying the threshold element. Although the concept of “borderline” case was often employed, there was no consensus on exactly which types of situations should not be subject to prosecution. Some states seemed intent on precluding the assertion of jurisdiction over minor acts of aggression, such as frontier scuffles or cross-border coast guard incursions; others wanted to exclude cases in which there was or would be no clear international consensus as to whether the state had committed an unlawful act. Some argued that the modifier “manifest” accomplishes neither of these two goals, but rather threatens to permit prosecutions of both low-level uses of force and potentially lawful or beneficial casus belli, such as bona fide humanitarian interventions; armed responses to terrorist attacks by non-state actors; actions in ex post or anticipatory self-defense; assistance to wars of national of 67 Iran, for one, insisted until the final days of the Kampala Conference that any act of aggression would constitute a “manifest violation” of the U.N. Charter that should give rise to individual criminal responsibility.

---

68 Rome Statute, supra note ___, art. 1.

70 See, e.g., Informal Inter-Sessional Meeting of the Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression (June 2007—ICC-ASP/6/SWGCA/INF.1), reprinted in BARRIGA, supra note ___, at 109, 199 (discussing debates over including reference to “war of aggression”).

71 Germany, for example, supported a high threshold for the crime, namely that the act of aggression had “the object or result of establishing a military occupation of, or annexing, the territory of such other State or part thereof by the armed forces of the attacking State.” See, e.g., Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court, Proposal Submitted by Germany, U.N. Doc. PCNICC/1999/DP.13 (July 30, 1999), available at U.N. Doc. PCNICC/1999/DP.13.

72 The Libyan-Egyptian War of July 21-24, 1977 provides an example. A group of Libyan civilians protesting Egypt’s impending peace treaty with Israel marched to the Egyptian border. They were stopped and turned back by the Egyptian Army. Libya responded by firing artillery over the border; on July 21, it sent a tank battalion over the border to conduct a raid against an Egyptian army position in Sallum. The Egyptians expected the incursion, and a much larger force ambushed the Libyans, harrying them back across the border. The following three days saw repeated Egyptian air and commando strikes against targets within Libya, and Egypt maintained ground and air superiority until an armistice was brokered by Algeria and the PLO.

liberation, peacekeeping or stability missions; actions to enforce no fly zones; actions in defense of nationals or to rescue hostages; and exercises of hot pursuit or the abduction of fugitives.\textsuperscript{74} Supporters of the term argued in turn that the list of acts in Article 8bis(2) would ensure that minor incursions across an international border would not constitute an act of aggression.

Delegates did not seriously consider amending the Rome Statute provisions addressed to available defenses;\textsuperscript{75} as a result, the crime of aggression is not subject to any special justification or excuse.\textsuperscript{76} In theory, individual defendants can invoke all of the existing defenses—subject to whatever adaptations are necessary—set out in Article 31(1) (mental disease or defect, intoxication, self-defense, the defense of others,\textsuperscript{77} and duress); Article 32 (mistake of fact or law); and Article 33 (superior orders). According to Article 31(1)(c)—the only provision that implicates the aggression determination directly—neither self-defense nor the defense of others is automatically proven in situations in which the defendant is acting on behalf of a state engaged in self-defense.\textsuperscript{78} At trial, the Trial Chamber may consider additional defenses pursuant to Article 31(3)\textsuperscript{79} and the applicable Rules of Procedure and Evidence.\textsuperscript{80}

Although delegates ostensibly adopted these complex provisions by consensus, the above analysis reveals the existence of a high degree of disagreement, controversy, and concerted silence that belies true agreement among states as to the definition and reach of the crime. All of this material also begs the normative question of whether the Rome Statute should include the crime of aggression at all. To a certain extent, of course, this question has become a moot one. Important and influential blocs of states (including the interlocking members of the Non-Aligned \textsuperscript{74} On March 1, 2008, for example, the Colombian military crossed the border into Ecuador and targeted elements of the FARC 48th Front, which was suspected of harboring Raúl Reyes, a senior FARC commander. The Colombians launched a combined air and ground assault on FARC positions on the Ecuadorian side of the border; when they met resistance, the Colombians launched an artillery strike on the encampment, killing some 20 FARC fighters, including Reyes. The regional uproar over the incursion was settled at the March 7, 2008, Rio Group meeting in Santo Domingo.

\textsuperscript{75} See, e.g., Informal Inter-Sessional Meeting of the Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression (June 2005—ICC-ASP/4/32), reprinted in \textsc{Barriga}, supra note ___, at 167, 173 (compiling discussion as to whether Article 33 addressing superior orders should be amended by, or referred to in, the aggression amendments); Stefan Barriga, \textit{Against the Odds: The Results of the Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression}, in \textsc{Barriga}, \textit{supra} note ___, at 1, 5 (noting that drafters endeavored to insert the aggression amendments into the ICC Statute as smoothly as possible without disturbing the provisions on defenses).

\textsuperscript{76} Some commentators (such as the former Ambassador-At-Large for War Crimes David Scheffer) proposed that the amendments include special exclusions to the crime of aggression, such as with respect to uses of armed force or deployments of armed forces made pursuant Security Council authorization, the “Uniting for Peace” Resolution (Res. 377 (1950)), or the inherent right of self-defense acknowledged in Article 51 of the U.N. Charter. \textit{See} David Scheffer, \textit{A Pragmatic Approach to Jurisdictional and Definitional Requirements for the Crime of Aggression in the Rome Statute}, \textit{41 Case Western Reserve J. Int’l L.} 397, 409 (2009).

\textsuperscript{77} The defense of property is available as a defense only with respect to war crimes charges and only when employed proportionately to protect essential property against an unlawful use of force according to Article 31(1)(c), which reads: “in the case of war crimes, [the self-defense and the defense of others is available to protect] property which is essential for the survival of the person or another person or property which is essential for accomplishing a military mission, against an imminent and unlawful use of force in a manner proportionate to the degree of danger to the person or the other person or property protected.”

\textsuperscript{78} This provision states: “The fact that the person was involved in a defensive operation conducted by forces shall not in itself constitute a ground for excluding criminal responsibility under this subparagraph.”

\textsuperscript{79} That Article reads: “At trial, the Court may consider a ground for excluding criminal responsibility other than those referred to in paragraph 1 where such a ground is derived from applicable law as set forth in article 21.”

\textsuperscript{80} \textit{See} Rule 80, Rules of Procedure and Evidence (setting forth procedures for raising a defense under Article 31(3)), ICC-ASP/1/3 (Part.II-A) (Sept. 9, 2002), available at http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/F1E0AC1C-A3F3-4A3C-B9A7-B3E8B115E886/140164/Rules_of_procedure_and_Evidence_English.pdf.
Movement, the Group of Latin American and Caribbean Countries, the Union of South American Nations, the so-called African Group of States Parties to the ICC, the Arab League, and the European Union) invested considerable energy in achieving the adoption of the aggression amendments. To varying degrees, these states are committed to seeing this project come to fruition. That said, the Court cannot exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression until a year after thirty states parties have ratified the amendments. Even then, the crime will not enter into force automatically; the Assembly of States Parties must decide in 2017 whether and how to activate the various trigger mechanisms. At that time, the operationalization of the crime of aggression could conceivably be delayed, amended, or even abandoned.

IV. Is The Codification of the Crime of Aggression Good For Women?

These preliminaries lead to the central question posed by this article: how will the codification and eventual prosecution of the crime of aggression in the Rome Statute impact the lives of women? As the analysis that follows reveals, many central elements of the final package adopted in Kampala cut two ways. A number of considerations commend the inclusion of the crime of aggression in the Rome Statute in theory; most of the concerns anticipate how the crime might be invoked and prosecuted in practice. Without any firm practice on which to rely, all that remains is speculation, which yields both cautious potential and potential cautions.

A. Jurisdictional Hurdles & State Consent

The jurisdictional regime suggests two conflicting concerns if we care about how the implementation of the crime of aggression will impact women: that the jurisdictional requirements are too narrow to allow any charges to be brought and that they are too broad and will allow too many charges to be brought or contemplated. Starting with the former concern: assuming the aggression amendments do eventually become operational, it remains to be seen whether they will ever be invoked. There are many ways in which the architects of war and state violence may be insulated from prosecution for the crime of aggression. At the procedural level, and as is the case with all the crimes within the Court’s jurisdiction, states parties and the Security Council may decline to exercise their authority, pursuant to their Article 14 and Article 13(b) powers, respectively, to refer aggression situations to the Court. In the exercise of prosecutorial discretion, the Prosecutor may decide not to launch investigations proprio motu pursuant to Article 15 or may decline to go forward with referred cases in “the interests of justice” per Article 53(1)(c). The aggression charges may not get confirmed pursuant to Article 61. The Security Council may use its Article 16 deferral powers to delay cases indefinitely; this virtually ensures that nationals of the Council’s five permanent members, or their close allies, will never come before the Court even if they should be implicated in international crimes. When it comes to the crime of aggression, the two jurisdictional filters may disallow the charges.

---

81 Resolution RC/Res.6, Article 15bis(2) (“The Court may exercise jurisdiction only with respect to crimes of aggression committed one year after the ratification or acceptance of the amendments by thirty States Parties.”); Resolution RC/Res.6, Article 15ter(2) (same).
Beyond these baseline procedural hurdles, however, lie more fundamental limitations to the reach of the aggression amendments. In the absence of a Security Council trigger, there are gaping holes in the crime’s jurisdictional regime: it excludes non-states parties altogether, and it further allows states parties to opt out of the aggression provisions. In this way, the Court’s jurisdictional reach over the crime of aggression is stunted; by way of contrast, the other crimes may be prosecuted so long as either the state of nationality of the accused or the territorial state is a party to the Statute. This differential regime stemmed from the fact that delegates viewed the crime of aggression as implicating state sovereignty more concretely and acutely than the other core crimes given that the crime has at its core the action of a sovereign state, which under international law enjoys certain prerogatives of agency, autonomy, and self-determination.

The principle of consent, as a manifestation of agency, plays a central role in both public international law and feminist theory. In the former, state consent has historically provided the basis for the formation and binding nature of international norms (as when states voluntarily join treaties, engage in state practice, and articulate opinio juris) as well as for the jurisdiction of international institutions. Indeed, the classical theory that international law is solely consent-based gives rise to one of its most fundamental and enduring criticisms. Consent is also at the root of the perennial debate between positivists and natural law theorists, the latter of whom insist that international law contains normative content independent of state consent and that morality is essential to law. State consent remains salient within international law notwithstanding the trend toward other more institutional or parliamentarian norm-setting processes. In feminist theory, consent functions as an analog to sovereignty in international law as an attribute and entitlement of personhood often denied to women.

Allowing potential aggressor states to choose whether or not to be bound to the penal prohibition of aggression warps the privilege of consent, which in many areas of the criminal law

---

82 Resolution RC/Res.6, Article 15bis(5).
83 Resolution RC/Res.6, Article 15bis(4).
84 Rome Statute, Article 12(2).
85 But see Diane Marie Amann, The International Criminal Court and the Sovereign State, in GOVERNANCE AND INTERNATIONAL LEGAL THEORY 185,191-93 (Ige F. Dekker & Wouter G. Werner eds., 2004) (arguing that the three original ICC crimes implicate state sovereignty as well).
86 According to the Monetary Gold case, an international tribunal is not competent to pronounce upon the rights and duties of states absent their consent such that a state cannot be forced to submit to international jurisdiction. Case of the Monetary Gold Removed from Rome in 1943 (Italy v. United States, United Kingdom & France), 1954 I.C.J. Rep. 19, available at http://www.icj-cij.org/docket/files/19/4761.pdf.
87 See S.S. Lotus, PCIJ Ser. A, No. 10, at 18 (1927) (“the rules of law binding on states therefore emanate from their own free will as expressed in conventions or by usages generally accepted as expressing principles of law. … Restrictions upon the independence of states cannot therefore be presumed.”).
90 Catherine Brölmann, The Decline of the Subject’s Individual Consent, presentation in THE CREATION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW: AN EXPLORATION OF NORMATIVE INNOVATION, CONTEXTUAL APPLICATION, AND INTERPRETATION IN A TIME OF FLUX (August 6-7, 2010) (noting trends indicating the decline in the role of consent in other areas of international law formation). See also Catherine Brölmann, International Organizations and Treaties: Contractual Freedom and Institutional Constraint, in RESEARCH HANDBOOK ON INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS (J. Klabbers, ed., 2010).
belongs to the victim if it is relevant at all. To be sure, the opt out is available to both potential aggressor and potential victim states. There may be valid reasons why the latter would not want acts of aggression perpetrated on their territories to be the subject of prosecution before the ICC, as when such proceedings might exacerbate—a situation; hamper the ability of warring parties to reach political or diplomatic solutions; or undermine efforts at reconciliation between embattled societies. However, it is also clear that neither set of states will necessarily consult women and other vulnerable segments of their populace in making the decision to join the aggression amendments or to exercise the right to opt out of them.

Of course, it is not inevitable that states parties will act to exit the aggression provisions. A genuine faith in the crime, the power of inertia, and contrary pressure from domestic and international civil society may make it undesirable or politically difficult for states parties to avail themselves of the opt out option set out in the Kampala package. At the same time, by premising the provisions’ entry into force and jurisdictional reach on exercises of consent, the drafters of the aggression regime created opportunities for the exercise or withholding of consent to be coerced, which feminist theory has long demonstrated is an inevitable consequence of power differentials. Both the ratification process and the opt out regime threaten a ratification “cold war” among the Assembly of States Parties as strong states or blocs of states try to coerce parties to either join or reject the aggression provisions. Potential victim states—the feminized party in any aggression dyad—in particular may find themselves under pressure to opt out of the aggression amendments and thus to immunize their territory from aggression charges.

The ability of the Security Council to refer situations to the Court under Article 15ter without reference to state consent (and to serve as a primary filter for aggression cases brought under Article 15bis) will become that much more important, assuming the Assembly of States Parties decides to activate this trigger mechanism over the crime. Ensuring a central role for the Council in aggression prosecutions provides an opening for the principles set forth in Security 92 There are certain crimes to which a victim cannot consent, such as murder, although consent at times can give rise to mitigation where, for example, the victim engaged in the criminal conduct that resulted in his death. See, e.g., State v. Ryan, 534 N.W.2d 766, 784-85 (Neb. 1995) (victim consent mitigator inapplicable where victim—a member of a cult group—allegedly initially consented to corporal punishment inflicted by the group leader but was later killed). See also Protocol To Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime, Annex II, art. 3, Dec. 12, 2000, G.A. Res. 55/25, U.N. Doc. A/55/383 (2000) (providing that the apparent consent of the victim of trafficking is irrelevant where the trafficker threatened or used force, employed forms of coercion, abused his or her power, or exploited a position of vulnerability). See generally Kara Abramson, Note: Beyond Consent, Toward Safeguarding Human Rights: Implementing the United Nations Trafficking Protocol, 44 HARV. INT’L L. 473 (2003).

---

93 Once the Court’s jurisdiction is triggered, it can only be halted by the Security Council (Article 16), the Pre-Trial Chamber (by failing, for example, to confirm the charges pursuant to Article 61), or by the exercise of prosecutorial discretion (pursuant to Article 53 and 61, which set forth when the prosecutor can decline to pursue or withdraw charges).

94 Very few states parties availed themselves of the war crimes opt out available in Article 124. See Beth Van Schaack, Article 124: To Be or Not To Be?, INTLAWGRRLS, http://intlawgrrls.blogspot.com/2010/05/article-124-to-be-or-not-to-be.html. The Assembly of States Parties decided in Kampala to retain this opt out provision, notwithstanding that it has been controversial and little used. See Resolution RC/Res.4 (16 June 2010 13:00), available at http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/Resolutions/RC-Res.4-ENG.pdf.

95 There is a risk, however, that the lack of a Security Council filter for the crime of aggression in Council-referred situations will chill referrals of other situations. See Article 15ter. The concern is that without a filter control mechanism to eliminate aggression charges, the Council may not refer situations when it is concerned that the prosecutor may bring improvident aggression charges.
Council Resolutions 1325, 1820, and 1888—which recognized that wartime gender-based and sexual violence against women constitutes a threat to international peace and security that may exacerbate conflicts—to contribute a gender perspective to the penal enforcement of the prohibition against aggression. Indeed, the Darfur referral has already demonstrated the way in which Council action can promote accountability for gender-based and sexual violence. Those resolutions may also enable advocates to argue that military interventions in situations involving gender-based violence should receive Council approval.

B. Definitional Limitations and Advantages

Unlike the other core crimes within the ICC Statute, there are no gender-specific charging elements in the definition of the crime. An obvious substantive limitation to the aggression amendments is the fact that they are confined to acts of aggression committed by states, an approach that serves to reinforce the statist orientation of international law. There is no notion of a crime of aggression that may be committed by non-state actors, such as insurgents or terrorists, or by states against their own citizens. These blind spots significantly discounts the diversity of threats to international peace and security in contemporary international relations and guarantees that the prohibition on aggression will apply to only a fraction of the armed conflicts endured by women. In this way, the crime of aggression is not coextensive with the modern taxonomy of conflict classification under international humanitarian law.

96 See supra notes ___.
100 This statist approach is arguably retrograde given the increased application of international law to non-state actors, such as terrorist groups, indigenous peoples, multinationals, non-governmental organizations, etc. See CATHERINE A. MacKINNON, TOWARD A FEMINIST THEORY OF THE STATE 159-165 (1989) (discussing deprivations of women’s rights attributed to civil society); Jan Arno Hessbruegge, Human Rights Violations Arising From Conduct Of Non-State Actors, 11 BUFF. HUM. RTS. L. REV. 21 (2005).
103 Not without controversy, Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions re-conceptualized wars of national liberation, wars against colonial domination, and wars against racist regimes as international armed conflicts based upon their when the aggressive acts of non-state actors may be attributed to another state according to general principles of state responsibility that the crime of aggression may apply more broadly. These principles of attribution may enable aggression charges to be brought in armed conflicts that on their surface appear to be internal, but which may in fact sufficiently involve other states acting through non-state proxies. Because gender-based violence is often viewed as a phenomenon of the private sphere, attributing such crimes to state actors has proved difficult over the years. Similar problems of attribution may arise where the acts of non-state actors must be attributed to states parties to the ICC. If we believe prosecutions for the crime of aggression will improve the lives of women, the fact that the definition of the crime has been drafted to address only a narrow class of armed conflicts will limit its impact considerably.

The leadership element of the crime has both commendable and worrisome aspects. On the one hand, the focus of the aggression amendments on leaders, rather than followers, may facilitate the prosecution of the architects of aggression. It may be difficult to connect individuals sitting at the pinnacle of a chain of command far from the events in question to the commission of war crimes or crimes against humanity through principles of derivative or superior liability, either because they can hide behind lawful rules of engagement or otherwise evade responsibility through raising reasonable doubt about their knowledge of abuses or ability to exercise effective control over subordinates. That said, the ad hoc tribunals have enjoyed some success in prosecuting the caliber of political leaders who might eventually be indicted for the crime of aggression: Slobodan Milošević, Momcilo Krajišnik, Biljana Plavšić, and Radovan

104 See Article 8, International Law Commission, Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, Article 37 (“The conduct of a person or group of persons shall be considered an act of a State under international law if the person or group of persons is in fact acting on the instructions or, or under the direction or control of, that State in carrying out the conduct.”). Because the acts of non-state actors would be attributed to a state as a jurisdictional precondition, the effective control test of Nicaragua would likely be applicable rather than the overall control test developed by the ICTY in Tadić to determine conflict classification. Compare Case Concerning Military And Paramilitary Activities In And Against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America), Merits, Judgement of 27 June 1986, 1986 ICJ Report 1986 14, para. 115 (“For this conduct [by the contras] to give rise to legal responsibility of the United States, it would in principle have to be proved that the State had effective control of the military or paramilitary operations in the course of which the alleged violations were committed.”) with Prosecutor v. Tadić, Case No. IT–94–1–A, Judgement, para. 137 (July 15, 1999) (finding that the former Yugoslavia exercised sufficient overall control over the Bosnian Serb forces to internationalize the conflict and holding that the “control required by international law may be deemed to exist when a State (or, in the context of an armed conflict, the party to the conflict) has a role in organizing, co-ordinating or planning the military actions of the military group, in addition to financing, training and equipping or providing operational support to that group.”).

106 Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., Case No. IT–96–21–A, Judgement, paras. 197, 266 (Feb. 20, 2001) (confirming effective control standard).

107 The ICTY confirmed three omnibus indictments against Milošević concerning the wars in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia, and Kosovo. Milošević died, however, before the close of the defense case, thus robbing the Tribunal and victims of a verdict. Nonetheless, the indictment alone set an important precedent as one of the first against a sitting Karadžić (the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia); Theoneste Bagasora and Jean Kambanda (the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda); Charles Taylor (the Special Court for Sierra Leone); and Ieng Sary and Khieu Samphan (the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia). These leaders, however, hailed from weak, vanquished, obsolete, or pariah regimes. The ICC arrest warrants against President Al-Bashir of the Sudan provide a first test for whether the ICC will be able to follow suit. Even with ostensible Security Council backing, Al Bashir remains at large, although he is increasingly marginalized internationally if not domestically.\(^{109}\) If the likes of Al-Bashir cannot be apprehended for the commission of crimes against humanity and genocide against his own people, mustering the political will to capture leaders charged with the more controversial crime of aggression will be difficult.

On the other hand, no one has systematically asked women whether they would prefer for those who initiate the armed conflicts that unleash other international crimes to be prosecuted if it is at the expense of the local warlords whom victims directly associate with abuses.\(^{110}\) While the prosecution of such higher ups for the crime of aggression may bring international attention to a region and a conflict, it may also absorb the limited capacity of the Court, leaving lower-level offenders to be prosecuted locally, if at all. Where gender-specific violence is at issue, women may assign primary responsibility to these perpetrators for the crimes committed in their communities and against them. The tendency of the ICC to focus on top leaders demonstrates the importance of positive complementarity, the promise of which has not yet been fulfilled in the situations currently under investigation or indictment by the ICC.\(^{111}\) Indeed, the domestic prosecution of gender-based violence lags in a number of jurisdictions under consideration by \(^{108}\) The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) convicted Biljana Plavšić, former President of the Republika Srpska. The Prosecutor had indicted her for genocide, complicity in genocide, and the crimes against humanity of persecution, extermination, killing, deportation, and inhumane acts for her role in planning, instigating, ordering, and aiding and abetting, and jointly executing ethnic cleansing. Plavšić pled guilty to Count 3 of the indictment—persecution. The ICTY sentenced her to 11 years’ imprisonment, though she was granted early release for “good behavior” and “substantial evidence of rehabilitation.” Prosecutor v. Plavšić, Case No. IT–00–39 & 40–1–T, Sentencing Judgement (Feb. 27, 2003).

\(^{110}\) Population-based surveys are inconclusive as to the preferences of affected communities for prosecutions of big versus little fish. These diverse attitudes likely reflect the nature of the conflict and the sources of violence. See HUMAN RIGHTS CENTER ET AL., BUILDING PEACE, SEEKING JUSTICE: A POPULATION-BASED SURVEY ON ATTITUDES ABOUT ACCOUNTABILITY AND SOCIAL RECONSTRUCTION IN THE CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC 26 (August 2010), http://hrc.berkeley.edu/pdfs/BuildingPeace-SeekingJustice-CAR_August2010.pdf (noting that approximately a third of respondents in the Central African Republic called for the prosecution of the top political leaders). For example, studies in the Democratic Republic of Congo more frequently suggested that militia members were a higher prosecutorial priority than political leaders. See HUMAN RIGHTS CENTER ET AL., LIVING WITH FEAR: A POPULATION-BASED SURVEY ON ATTITUDES ABOUT PEACE, JUSTICE, AND SOCIAL RECONSTRUCTION IN EASTERN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF CONGO 41, 43 (August 2008), http://hrc.berkeley.edu/pdfs/LivingWithFear-DRC.pdf. In Uganda, by contrast, respondents favored prosecution of the leaders of the Lord’s Resistance Army rather than followers, who—it was viewed—may have been recruited against their will. HUMAN RIGHTS CENTER, NEW POPULATION-BASED DATA ON ATTITUDES ABOUT PEACE AND JUSTICE, 6 (2007), http://hrc.berkeley.edu/pdfs/Uganda-survey-research-note.pdf.

the ICC, so leaving such prosecutions to domestic courts may amount to impunity for the individuals whom women would most want to see prosecuted.

C. The Crime’s Reach: Collateral Damage

These observations about the fundamental responsibility of the architects of aggression point to a rationale advanced in support of the inclusion of the crime of aggression in the Rome Statute. From the perspective of women, the crime suggests a way that much of the harm experienced by women in war can be captured by international criminal law in a way it is not currently.112 In particular, so-called collateral damage will become the evidentiary basis for many charges of aggression that might be pursued.

Adding the crime of aggression to the Rome Statute has filled what many have viewed as a lacuna in the pantheon of international crimes.113 In the words of the Nuremberg Tribunal in its Judgment: “To initiate a war of aggression … is not only an international crime; it is the supreme international crime differing only from other war crimes in that it contains within itself the accumulated evil of the whole.”114 The theory is that once the peace is breached by the commission of an act of aggression or the launching of a war of aggression, conditions exist that facilitate, indeed unleash, other forms of violence. Troops are deployed, arms proliferate, detention centers are established, human groups are vilified, and brutality becomes normalized. At the doctrinal level, war crimes cannot be committed outside of a state of armed conflict or occupation, and violence perpetrated by a military force can constitute crimes against humanity when the civilian population is attacked on a widespread or systematic basis.115 The Rwandan tragedy demonstrates that an armed conflict can serve as a pretext for genocide.116 A state of war thus enables, encourages, and exacerbates multiple forms of violence, including gender-based violence. Given the demonstrated causal relationship between acts of aggression and other atrocities, a prosecution for the crime of aggression has the potential to empower the Court to tell a fuller story of a particular dispute, expose root causes, and assign legal responsibility—not just moral opprobrium—to those who would unleash violence on the globe.117

113 See supra note ___.

116 Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, Case No. ICTR–95–1–T, Judgement, para. 607 (21 May 1999) (discussing how the prosecutor’s allegations showed “that the armed conflict had been used as pretext to unleash an official policy of genocide.”).

It is clear that the aggression may be the only charge that can be brought in the wake of a clean, but unlawful, war or in response to an armed attack by a national armed force that does not rise to the level of an armed conflict or target protected persons. It is often assumed that aggressive operations will be more brutal and indiscriminate than other uses of force, and this is often borne out in practice. In such conflicts, a comprehensive war crimes indictment will go far toward assigning responsibility for the horrors of war. But, even a cleanly fought but aggressive war harms civilians, societies, and the international community. Under these circumstances, aggression may be the only charge that can be leveled against responsible leaders, thus increasing the retributive potential of international criminal law.

Where the aggression charge is at the forefront of an indictment, the conceptualization of the crime will inevitably not be confined to the singular act of crossing an international border with guns drawn, but rather will encompass a consideration of a host of consequential harms to the victim state and its populace. Thus, an aggression charge can indirectly condemn conduct that would otherwise escape penal sanction because it is not a war crime, a crime against humanity, or an act of genocide. These consequential harms can include the killing of privileged combatants dans le combat, the quintessential act of war; the use of proportionate force against lawful targets; and even so-called “collateral damage”—incidental harm to civilians that occurs in the pursuit of a lawful military objective. All such acts may become indirectly actionable through an aggression prosecution. Most importantly, the daily harms experienced by women in war—whose fate is so often concealed behind the collateral damage euphemism—can serve as an evidentiary basis for, and gain greater visibility through, the crime of aggression. Without such consideration of the concrete consequences or effects of an act of aggression, the Court will be unable to evaluate the gravity threshold and the crime of aggression would be reduced to a mere abstraction.

This potential of the codification and prosecution of the crime of aggression to condemn the consequences of war was recognized during the post-World War II era, when the Allies first prosecuted crimes against the peace, although this theory of expansive responsibility never 118 The March 26, 2010, torpedo attack on the South Korean Warship “Cheonan” provides a useful example. Eye witness accounts, an examination of the damage to the vessel, an analysis of seabed evidence, and the recovered torpedo all led a joint military/civilian international investigation to conclude that the ship was sunk by a North Korean torpedo. There was no “other plausible explanation.” Nick Loader, Investigation concludes North Korean missile sunk the Cheonan killing 46, Asian Correspondent (May 21, 2010), available at http://us.asiancorrespondent.com/video/investigation-concludes-north-korea.htm. The attack thus appears to be a classic case of bilateral aggression, with a clear victim state and an increasingly clear aggressor state without all of the messiness of most modern armed conflicts, which involve heightened tensions evolving into gradual escalations, border incidents and incursions, shots over the proverbial bow, etc. without a clear “prime mover” contemplated by Article 2 of Resolution 3314 (“The First use of armed force by a State in contravention of the Charter shall constitute prima facie evidence of an act of aggression … “). The victims of the Cheonan attack were 46 crew members, all male, and no civilians were injured. Assuming the attack exceeds the necessary threshold with respect to “character, gravity, and scale” in Article 8bis(1), which it may not on its own unless the long history of tensions between the two nations are taken into account, aggression would be the only chargeable crime. See Democracy Now!, Historian Bruce Cumings: US Stance on Korea Ignores Tensions Rooted in 65-Year-Old Conflict; North Korea Sinking Could Be Response to November ’09 South Korea Attack (May 27, 2010), http://www.democracynow.org/2010/5/27/nk (quoting historian’s comment that the attack was part of a “continuing war that has never ended”). The attack could not be charged as a war crime (for lack of an armed conflict or victim with protected person status) or crime against humanity (for lack of an attack against a civilian population). Given that men predominate in national forces, prosecutions for such acts of aggression are not likely to involve significant numbers of women victims. See supra note ___.

---

received the full blessing of either international tribunal. Lawyers within the U.S. delegation developed the legal position that those who initiated unlawful wars of aggression were therefore responsible for all the wrongs that then ensued. This argument found particular expression in the Tokyo proceedings, in which the defendants were charged in one set of counts with murder and mayhem in addition to crimes against the peace. A number of these counts focused on conventional war crimes, such as the killing of prisoners of war and the literal and figurative rape of Nanking. Counts 37 through 43, however, focused on the killing of members of the armed forces during Japan’s aggressive actions. For example, Count 38 of the indictment charged a number of defendants with participation in a common plan or conspiracy the object of which was to “kill and murder … both members of the armed forces … and civilians.” Count 39 similarly 119 See United States v. Altstötter et al. (“The Justice Trial”), UNITED NATIONS WAR CRIMES COMMISSION, VI LAW REPORTS OF TRIALS OF WAR CRIMINALS 52 (1947–9) (dismissing the view that “by reason of the fact that the war was a criminal war of aggression, every act which would have been legal in a defensive war was illegal in this one” on the ground that otherwise, “the rules of land warfare upon which the prosecution has relied would not be the measure of conduct, and the pronouncement of guilt in any case would become a mere formality.”); United States v. William List et al., XI TRIALS OF WAR CRIMINALS BEFORE THE NUREMBERG MILITARY TRIBUNALS, 1247-8 (1950) (“whatever may be the cause of a war that has broken out, and whether or not the cause be a so-called just cause, the same rules of international law are valid as to what must not be done, may be done, and must be done by the belligerents themselves in making war against each other. … The rules of international law apply to war from whatever cause it originates.”) (citations removed).

120 Jonathan Bush, “The Supreme … Crime” and its Origins: The Lost Legislative History of the Crime of Aggressive War, 102 COLUM. L. REV. 2324, 2377 (2002). The British were also on board with this proposition. In an opening statement, the British Prosecutor, Sir Hartley Shawcross, reasoned that:

The killing of combatants in war is justifiable, both in international and in national law, only where the war is legal. But where the war is illegal... there is nothing to justify the killing, and these murders are not to be distinguished from those of any other lawless robber band.

Walter Gary Sharp, Sr., Revoking An Aggressor’s License To Kill Military Forces Serving The United Nations: Making Deterrence Personal, 22 MD. J. INT’L L. & TRADE 1, 1 (1998). But see Hersch Lauterpacht, The Limits of the Operation of the Law of War, 30 BRIT. Y.B. INT’L L. 206, 217 n.4 (surmising that Shawcross was “referring not to the responsibility of the individual members of the armed forces of the aggressor but only to the liability of those guilty of planning and instigating the war.”).

The following Counts charge the crimes of murder, and conspiracy to murder, being acts for which it is charged that the persons named and each of them are individually responsible, being at the same time Crimes against Peace, Conventional War Crimes, and Crimes against Humanity, contrary to all the paragraphs of Article 5 of the said Charter, to International Law, and to the domestic laws of all the countries where committed, including Japan, or to one or more of them.

Id. See also Boister, supra note ___ at 439.

122 The Count charged the defendants with endeavoring to:

unlawfully to kill and murder the persons described below, by initiating unlawful hostilities against the United States of America, the Commonwealth of the Philippines, the British Commonwealth of Nations, the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Kingdom of Thailand, and unlawfully ordering, causing and permitting the armed forces of Japan to attack the territory, ships and airplanes of the said nations or some of them at times when Japan would be at peace with the said nations. The persons intended to be killed and murdered were all such persons, both members of the armed forces of the said nations and civilians, as might happen to be in the places at the charged the attack on Pearl Harbor, at a time when Japan and the United States were at peace, and the deaths of Admiral Isaac C. Kidd (the first U.S. Navy flag officer to die during WWII) and other members of the naval and military forces of the United States. In support of these charges, it was argued that the Japanese defendants could be charged with murder simpliciter in connection with all civilian and combatant deaths in the Pacific theater, even if they would otherwise have been lawful killings under the jus in bello. The theory was that the illegality of the war rendered Japanese defendants unprivileged combatants and thus vitiated any defense of combatant immunity. For their part, the defendants argued that “killings in the course of belligerent operations except in so far as they constituted violations of the rules of warfare or the laws and customs of war are the normal incidents of war and are not murder.”

Notwithstanding that the case was teed up to challenge the conceptual divide between the jus ad bellum and the jus in bello, the Tokyo Tribunal ultimately dismissed counts addressed to a conspiracy to commit any crimes other than crimes against the peace and addressed the harms alleged in the murder counts in connection with the omnibus crimes against the peace counts. The Tribunal seemed to recognize that the theory of comprehensive liability suggested by the murder counts would swallow all the other particulars of the indictment when it held: “In all cases the killing is alleged as arising from the unlawful waging of war. … If … the war, in any particular sense, is held to have been unlawful, then this involves unlawful killings not only upon the dates and at the places stated in these counts [of murder] but at all places in the theatre of war and at all times throughout the period of the war.”

The Allies’ attempt to hold Japanese defendants liable for all the harm caused by their aggressive war reflects the enduring intuitive appeal of the proposition that an otherwise lawful act of war (e.g., a proportionate attack on a military objective) committed within the context of an unlawful war is itself ipso facto unlawful even if no identifiable war crime has been committed. This proposition is, while appealing, doctrinally flawed. The long-standing distinction between the jus ad bellum (the law governing the decision to go to war) and the jus in bello (the law governing the waging of war) reflects the understanding that an unlawful war can be fought lawfully and a just war can be fought unlawfully. Thus, considerations of the right to times of such attacks. The said hostilities and attacks were unlawful … and the accused and the said armed forces of Japan could not therefore, acquire the rights of lawful belligerents.

---

123 Bush, supra note ____, at 2403, citing Letter of 19 Dec. 1944 by U.S. War Department lawyer William C. Chanler ("If [the war is illegal] must it not follow that when Hitler and his cohorts entered Czechoslovakia etc., ‘vi et armis’ [‘with force and arms’] they were not lawful belligerents under international law and therefore have no defense to a criminal charge or murder and banditry? For I take it that ‘Lawful Belligerency’ is a soldier’s only defense to a charge of murder.’"). Indeed, charging straight murder would have avoided the ex post facto problems posed by charging crimes against the peace. Sheldon Glueck, The Nuremberg Trial and Aggressive War, 59 HARV. L. REV. 397, 455-56 (1945-1946).

125 Id. at 48,450.

126 "No good purpose is to be served … in dealing with these parts of the offenses by way of counts for murder when the whole offence of waging those wars unlawfully is put in issue upon the counts charging the waging of such wars." Id. at 48,452-48,453.

127 Boister, supra note ____, at 427.

128 IMFTE Judgment, supra note ____, at 48,452.
use force are detached from considerations of how force is used or its consequences, and “once the primary rules prohibiting the use of force (i.e., the ius ad bellum) have been violated, the subsidiary rules of ius in bello must apply.” This acoustic separation is pragmatic as well as philosophical: the goal is to ensure compliance with humanitarian law regardless of which party is responsible for breaching international peace in the first place. Pursuant to the parity or symmetry thesis of IHL, the many protective principles of the ius in bello apply equally to all sides of a conflict, without reference to reciprocity and regardless of whether the ius ad bellum has been violated. The severability and independence of the two sets of doctrines also reflects states’ contractual obligations: once the Geneva Conventions achieved universal ratification, all States of the world became equally bound by the core ius in bello prohibitions contained in those treaties, which apply regardless of the origins or causes of the conflict.

D. IHL Repercussions

Adding the crime of aggression to the jurisdiction of the ICC thus has the potential to create bridges across the conceptual divide between the ius ad bellum and ius in bello. The apparent untraversability of these bodies of law exists for a reason, however, and their linkage may create negative consequences vis-à-vis the efficacy of some of the core protective doctrines of humanitarian law. Now that the ius ad bellum and the ius in bello will intersect in the ICC, labeling one side to a conflict the aggressor and one side the aggressed may undermine support for IHL on both sides, weakening a source of protection in international law for women and other vulnerable groups.

Enabling the prosecution of the crime of aggression may undermine support for the ius in bello. Governmental support at the highest level—where rules of engagement are drafted, targets indentified, and military strategy developed—is crucial to ensure compliance with humanitarian law more broadly. If leaders and policy-makers are susceptible to the threat of an aggression prosecution, an institutional commitment to adhere to humanitarian law may flag when and there may be little incentive to ensure that acts of war are implemented in accordance with humanitarian law. Potential defendants may legitimately fear that there will be a thumb on the 129 That the consequences of war are not taken into effect in determining its lawfulness gives rise to a perennial feminist critique of the law of war. See Dianne Otto, Integrating Questions of Gender into Discussions of the “Use of Force” in the International Curriculum, 6 LEGAL EDUC. REV. 219, 221-2 (1995).

---

130 Marco Sassoli, Ius ad Bellum and Ius in Bello—the Separation between the Legality of the Use of Force and Humanitarian Rules to be Respected in Warfare: Crucial or Outdated?, in INTERNATIONAL LAW AND ARMED CONFLICT: EXPLORING THE FAULTLINES 241, 244 (M.N. Schmitt & Jelena Pejic (eds.) 2007). Sassoli notes that the secondary rules—which inure to the benefit of individuals rather than states—are particularly important, because the primary rules have historically been controversial. Id.
131 Lauterpacht, supra note ___, at 211-213 (“Unless hostilities are to degenerate into a savage contest of physical forces freed from all restraints of compassion, chivalry, and respect for the dignity of man, it is essential that the accepted rules of war in that—humanitarian—sphere should continue to be observed.”).
132 Sassoli, supra note ___, at 246 (noting that promising not to look at who was at fault for initiating the conflict in the first place preserves incentives for compliance with humanitarian law).
133 See, e.g., Article 1, Convention (IV) relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (Aug. 12, 1949) (“The High Contracting Parties undertake to respect and to ensure respect for the present Convention in all circumstances.”); Protocol I, supra note __, at pmbl (“Reaffirming further that the provisions of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and of this Protocol must be fully applied in all circumstances to all persons who are protected by those instruments, without any adverse distinction based on the nature or origin of the armed conflict or on the causes espoused by or attributed to the Parties to the conflict.”).
scale against them in any war crimes prosecution when the conflict itself has been declared aggressive and their state determined to be the aggressor.\(^{134}\) Indeed, at the most radical of levels, does the principle of military necessity—which requires that armed attacks be designed and intended to defeat the opponent militarily—have any meaning in the context of an unjust war?\(^{135}\) Unless judges rigorously cordon off the aggression and war crimes analyses,\(^{136}\) the proportionality analysis and other applications of IHL will inevitably differ among combatants depending on which side of the conflict they represent.\(^{137}\)

Paradoxically, the threat of prosecution for the crime of aggression may weaken the enforcement of humanitarian law by those deemed to be engaging in a just war as well. Combatants hailing from the aggressed state may feel a lesser incentive to adhere to these rules.\(^{138}\) Prosecutors, judges and other observers for that matter may be more forgiving of breaches in such conflicts and cut combatants some slack—consciously or unconsciously.\(^{139}\) In the context of criminal proceedings, this bias may have an impact on the charges that are brought, the convictions that are handed down, and the sentences that are imposed.\(^{140}\) This \(^{134}\) See Amann, Against Aggression, supra note ___ (“the villainization of 1 side via an aggression prosecution could diminish a prosecutor’s appetite to pursue perpetrators of atrocities on all sides.”). Professor Amann continues: “[a]ny such risk compounds the problems of randomness and selectivity … that are endemic to international criminal justice.” Id. See also Diane Marie Amann, Group Mentality, Expressivism, and Genocide, 2 INT’L CRIM. L. REV. 93, 116 (2002) (discussing the way in which selectivity and randomness undermine any deterrent effect of the criminal law).

---

\(^{135}\) A military commission following World War II in the Ministries Case so wrote:

> By resorting to armed force, Germany violated the Kellogg-Briand Pact. It thereby became an international outlaw and every peaceable nation had the right to oppose it without becoming an aggressor, to help the attacked and join with those who had previously come to the aid of the victim. The doctrine of self-defence and military necessity was never available to Germany as a matter of international law, in view of its prior violation of that law.

\(^{137}\) Michael Bothe, Terrorism and the Legality of Pre-Emptive Force, 14 EUR. J. INT’L L. 227, 234 (2003) (“The individual military action undertaken within the framework of the conflict can only be judged in light of the ius in bello, but not by the yardstick of the ius ad bellum independently from the question of which party violated the ius ad bellum by starting the conflict.”). See also Sassòli, supra note ___, at 249 (“Jus ad bellum not only has no impact upon the applicability of IHL, but it also may not be used to interpret a provision of IHL.”); id. at 258 (noting that an admixture of ius in bello and ius ad bellum may render the cause for which belligerent fight significant in establishing differential legal standards, canons of interpretation and guidelines for adjudication) (citing William Bradford, Barbarians at the Gates: A Post-September 11\(^{th}\) Proposal to Rationalize the Laws of War, 73 MISSISSIPPI L. J. 639, 860 (2004)).

\(^{138}\) Protocol I, supra note ___, sets forth differential duties on attackers and defenders in Articles 57-58.

\(^{139}\) Sassòli, supra note ___, at 257.

\(^{140}\) The failure of the ICTR to indict members of the Tutsi-led Rwandan Patriotic Front may reflect this bias. Indeed, Prof. Ruth Wedgewood has argued that the ICTY’s one-sided prosecutions, traceable in part to political pressure from Rwanda’s allies, has enabled the establishment of a repressive government. See Ruth Wedgewood, Paul Kagame and Rwanda’s Faux Democracy, THE NEW REPUBLIC (Aug. 5, 2010) (arguing that the “West’s failure to address Tutsi violations of the laws of war has allowed [Rwandan President] Kagame to conclude, justifiable, that he can do nearly anything with impunity.”).
potentiality arose in the Sierra Leonean context in the case against the surviving leaders of the Civilian Defense Forces, pro-government militia that formed to assist the government in resisting the Revolutionary United Front/Armed Forces Revolutionary Council rebel juntas and restoring the democratically-elected government. In a case involving charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity, the Trial Chamber rejected the defendants’ defense of necessity, but determined that the fact that the defendants were fighting for a just case was a mitigating factor at sentencing. In fact, one judge would have acquitted altogether. Over a dissent, the Appeals Chamber reversed, ruling that allowing consideration into the political motives behind the defendants’ participation in the conflict would provide “implicit legitimacy to conduct that unequivocally violates the law—the precise conduct this Special Court was established to punish.” The sentences were increased to 15 and 20 years.

Adherence to IHL may also flag where states prosecute individuals lower down the chain of command for the crime of aggression. There may be no threat of prosecution for aggression before the ICC for those below the highest ranks, since the crime of aggression is framed as a leadership crime. If, however, states parties incorporate the crime of aggression into their domestic penal codes, as they have often done with respect to the other ICC crimes, legislators may reformulate the crime to reach lower-level perpetrators, such as officers with 142 Id. at paras. 79-91. The Special Court imposed a sentence of six and eight years’ imprisonment as compared to sentences of 45 and 50 years meted out to rebel defendants.

143 Prosecutor v. Fofana, Case No. SCSL-04-14-T, Separate Concurring and Partially Dissenting Opinion of Hon. Justice Bankole Thompson Filed Pursuant to Article 18 of the Statute, para. 90 (Aug. 2, 2007), http://www.haguejusticeportal.net/Docs/SCSL/The%20CDF%20Judgment_3_2-8-2007.pdf (“there can be little doubt that in the context of the intensely conflictual situation prevailing at the material time in Sierra Leone dominated by utter chaos, fear, alarm and despondency, fighting for the restoration of democracy and constitutional legitimacy could be rightly perceived as an act of both patriotism and altruism, overwhelmingly compelling disobedience to a supranational regime of prescriptive norms.”). See also id. at paras. 68-92 (arguing that defendants are entitled to the defense of necessity).
146 Id. at para. 565.
147 See text accompanying note ___.
148 Very few states at present have a crime of aggression in their penal codes. A few provisions exist in the codes of Central Asia, Eastern Europe and elsewhere; most predate the ICC; and to the extent that they include a definition at all, they are loosely based on the WWII definitions, penalize only a “war of aggression,” or are predicated on violations of international treaties. See Astrid Reisinger Coracini, Evaluating Domestic Legislation on the Customary Crime of Aggression Under the Rome Statute’s Complementarity Regime, in The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court 725 (Carston Stahn & Göran Sluiter, eds., 2009) (compiling domestic statutes on aggression).
149 States are not strictly obliged to harmonize their domestic codes with the Rome Statute or to enable the exercise of universal jurisdiction over ICC crimes. The only mandatory language in the Statute obliging states parties to enact domestic legislation concerns state cooperation (Part 9) and the obligation to assert jurisdiction over offenses against the administration of justice (Article 70(4)). There is preambular language recalling pre-existing obligations for all States (not just states parties) to prosecute international crimes. In practice, however, many states parties have amended their domestic law in order to enjoy the privilege of complementarity. See Coalition for an International Criminal Court, Implementation of the Rome Statute, http://www.iccnow.org/?mod=romeimplementation (compiling statutes).
operational or tactical command, as opposed to those with strategic command, or even foot soldiers. The rationale for prosecuting leaders for initiating an act of aggression is not always easily contained to the highest leadership circle. At a minimum, if taken to its natural conclusion, and in keeping with the maxim ex injuria jus non oritur ("a right cannot arise from a wrong"), all officers and foot soldiers down the chain of command could be stripped of the defense of combatant immunity for participating in an act of aggression absent some theory that the rank and file were acting under duress or were non-culpable innocent agents entitled to assume they were fighting a lawful war. Without the promise of combatant immunity, combatants may lose tangible incentives to adhere to the jus in bello, although may still comply for deontological reasons. This law, perhaps more than any other, is based on carefully balanced privileges and responsibilities; remove a privilege and the commitment to respect the corresponding prohibitions wanes.

It remains to be seen if states incorporate the crime of aggression into their penal codes. The aggression amendments do not oblige states parties to do so. The final aggression amendments contain several important interpretive "understandings" addressed to the customary international law status of the definition of aggression adopted and denying any right or obligation on the part of states parties to incorporate the definition of aggression into their penal codes. It remains to be seen whether these understandings will be instrumental in discouraging 150 Campaigns and major operations to achieve strategic objectives in theaters or operational areas are planned at the operational level of war. Battles and engagements are planned and executed at the tactical level of war. The crime of aggression, as it has been formulated within the ICC amendments, is prosecutable at the strategic level of war—that echelon in which a nation’s leadership determines strategic security objectives and uses military resources to achieve these objectives. See DEPT. OF DEFENSE, DICTIONARY OF MILITARY TERMS, http://www.dtic.mil/doctrine/dod_dictionary/.

152 In this regard, the crime of aggression draws parallels with efforts before U.S. military commissions to prosecute unprivileged combatants for harm to privileged combatants. See Military Commissions Act, Pub. L. No. 109–366, 120 Stat. 2600 (Oct. 17, 2006) (penalizing "murder in violation of the law of war" as follows: "Any person subject to this chapter who intentionally kills one or more persons, including privileged belligerents, in violation of the law of war shall be punished by death or such other punishment as a military commission under this chapter may direct.").

153 Boister, supra note __, at 443.

154 François Bugnion, Just Wars, Wars of Aggression and International Humanitarian Law, 84 INT’L REV. RED CROSS 523, 541 (2002) ("It is a delusion to expect a soldier to respect the laws and customs of war if he himself is declared an outlaw by the mere fact of belonging to a State designated an aggressor. No amount of legal argument will persuade a combatant to respect the rules when he himself has been deprived of their protection.").

155 Lauterpacht, supra note __, at 211-213 (considering this bald tradeoff a feature of the “defective” nature of international law).

156 The customary law status of the crime of aggression was central to the British House of Lords case of R. v. Jones, [2006] UKHL 16, one of the few domestic cases to consider the crime of aggression. The issue arose in Jones as a defense to charges of aggravated trespass and criminal damage when the defendants attempted to disrupt activities at British military bases to impede British involvement in the Operation Iraqi Freedom (2003). The defendants argued that they were entitled to use reasonable force to prevent the commission of a crime (viz., the crime of aggression). The House of Lords determined that although the crime of aggression existed under customary international law, no such crime existed in British law so the defense was unavailable. See Beth Van Schaack, Adjudicating Aggression in Domestic Courts, INTLAWGRRLS, http://intlawgrrls.blogspot.com/2010/04/adjudicating-aggression-in-domestic.html.

157 These Understandings read:
states from internalizing the crime of aggression, drafting their own idiosyncratic definitions of the crime, or subjecting the crime to expansive bases of jurisdiction, such as universal jurisdiction.

E. The Two Sides of Deterrence

Needless-to-say, it would be a singular achievement if the crime of aggression were able to reduce the incidence of conflict in the world and so to make real the “right to peace” for which so many women yearn.

And yet, the counter-fear exists that the crime of aggression, given that it is broadly and ambiguously worded, will over-deter some uses of force that may be beneficial, such a humanitarian interventions. If we hold out the promise of humanitarian intervention as a way to protect women from the ravages of war, the codification of the crime of aggression may chill the willingness of states to undertake such discretionary operations.

As is the goal of any penal prohibition, advocates for the crime hope that in addition to dispensing retribution for past acts of violence, the existence of the crime of aggression in the Rome Statute will contribute to the deterrence of future acts of aggression. The theory is that the threat of prosecution and the assignment of individual criminal responsibility will raise the cost of resorting to armed force in international relations, in a way that recourse only to principles of state responsibility for breaches of the U.N. Charter’s prohibition on the use of force arguably has not.

4. It is understood that the amendments that address the definition of the act of aggression and the crime of aggression do so for the purpose of this Statute only. The amendments shall, in accordance with article 10 of the Rome Statute, not be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than this Statute.

5. It is understood that the amendments shall not be interpreted as creating the right or obligation to exercise domestic jurisdiction with respect to an act of aggression committed by another State.

The United States in particular advocated for these provisions to emphasize that the amendments would be adopted solely for the purpose of prosecutions under the Rome Statute and that there is a divergence of views among states as to whether the definitions of “crime of aggression” in Article 8-bis(1) and “act of aggression” in Article 8-bis(2) reflect statements of customary international law. The ultimate goal was to undermine any tendency to refer to these definitions as evidence of the progressive development of customary international law and to signal that states are not obliged to incorporate the crime of aggression into their domestic codes, or launch domestic prosecutions for the crime, upon ratification or acceptance of the aggression amendments. The concern was that it would wreak havoc on the international scene were states to incorporate the definition of aggression in their domestic penal codes and then indict world leaders in municipal courts, especially if based on expansive principles of extraterritorial jurisdiction.

The Princeton Principles list crimes against the peace as among the international crimes subject to universal jurisdiction. Article 2, Princeton Principles on Universal Jurisdiction 29 (2001), available at http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/instree/princeton.html. The commentary indicates that the issue was discussed at length and that while many argued that the crime “constitutes the most serious international crime, others contend[ed] that defining the crime of ‘aggression’ is in practice extremely difficult and divisive. In the end, ‘crimes against the peace’ were included, despite some disagreement, in part in order to recall the wording of Article 6(a) of the Nuremberg Charter.” Id. at 47.

Though we are almost twenty years into the renaissance of the field, the deterrent effect of international criminal law remains speculative.\(^{160}\) Although they will undoubtedly be high profile, aggression cases may prove to be too episodic to exert a general deterrent effect in the classical sense in which world leaders weigh the costs of injury against the perceived benefit of the prohibited activities.\(^{161}\) Assuming the most robust enforcement, international criminal law involves extreme conduct that is perhaps less susceptible to formal processes of deterrence. Even the crime’s most avid supporters likely do not anticipate that the crime will bring about a Kantian perpetual peace.\(^{162}\) Yet, the threat of suit for the crime of aggression will undoubtedly register some impact, especially on political leaders, who are concerned about preserving their political viability domestically and abroad and are more likely to calculate the costs and benefits of a particular course of action.\(^{163}\) The reverberations generated by a single indictment against a world leader for aggression may be enough to compel other governmental officials to think twice before resorting to force. In the long run, the hope is that political elites will eventually internalize more robust inhibitions against resorting to the use of force in their international relations.\(^{164}\)

The deterrent potential of the crime of aggression gives rise to a counter-fear that the new provisions will over-deter and, in effect, chill lawful or otherwise legitimate uses of force,\(^{165}\) such as: multilateral, regional,\(^{166}\) or unilateral peacekeeping missions and humanitarian interventions;\(^{167}\) rescue operations;\(^{168}\) or even military responses to acts of terrorism that might \(^{160}\) See generally David Wippman, Atrocities, Deterrence, and the Limits of International Justice, 23 FORDHAM INT’L L. J. 473 (1999) (questioning the deterrent effect of international criminal law); Amann, Group Mentality, \(supra\) note ___, at 115-117 (questioning goal of deterrence in international criminal law). Indeed, it remains speculative in domestic penal law as well.

\(^{162}\) Emmanuel Kant, Perpetual Peace (1795), in THE MORALITY OF WAR: CLASSICAL AND CONTEMPORARY READINGS 110 (Larry May et al., eds. 2006).

\(^{163}\) Payam Akhavan, Beyond Impunity: Can International Criminal Justice Prevent Future Atrocities?, 95 AM. J. INT’L L. 7, 11 (2001) (“Where leaders engage in some form of rational cost-benefit calculation, the threat of punishment can increase the costs of a policy that is criminal under international law. Leaders may be desperate, erratic, or even psychotic, but incitement to ethnic violence is usually aimed at the acquisition and sustained exercise of power.”).

\(^{165}\) Louis Henkin, Kosovo and the Law of ‘Humanitarian Intervention,’ 93 AM. J. INT’L L. 824, (1999) (arguing that the Kosovo intervention was legitimate).

\(^{166}\) In 1990, then-President Samuel Doe asked Nigeria for assistance in repelling Charles Taylor in the First Liberian Civil War. Nigeria, in turn, brought in the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), which deployed the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group (ECOMOG). Well after the fact, the U.N. Security Council approved the intervention via Chapter VII. See S.C. Res. 788 (Nov. 19, 1992) (welcoming ECOMOG involvement in Liberia). It is thus unclear if ECOMOG was operating in Liberia with the full consent of President Doe; it was certainly not acting with U.N. endorsement from 1990 until the passage of Resolution 788. In any case, ECOWAS members could not have counted on receiving retroactive blessing from the Council at the time they felt compelled to act. See generally Christopher Tuck, Every Car or Moving Object Gone” ECOMOG Intervention in Liberia, 4 AFR. STUD. Q. 1, available at http://web.africa.ufl.edu/asq/v4/v4i1a1.htm. The primary ground of criticism of the intervention concerned misconduct by ECOMOG troops. Id. See generally, HUMAN RIGHTS WATCH, WAGING WAR TO KEEP THE PEACE: THE ECOMOG INTERVENTION AND HUMAN RIGHTS (June 1993), http://www.hrw.org/reports/1993/liberia/#2.

\(^{167}\) See International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereign (ICISS), The Responsibility to Protect 69 (International Development Research Centre 2001)(“the responsibility to protect its people from killing and other grave harm was the most basic and fundamental of all the responsibilities that sovereignty imposes—and if a state incapacitate terrorist organizations and prevent future attacks. In all these contexts, uncertainties surrounding the definition of the crime, coupled with the checkerboard jurisdictional regime and the concomitant unequal threat of prosecution among states, will no doubt impede coalition-building, adherence to military alliances, and other multilateral responses to global threats. States that have joined the aggression amendments may have different tolerances for the degree of uncertainty inherent to the reach of the aggression amendments. This difficulty in mobilizing joint action may paradoxically lead to more unilateral actions by states not subject to the moderating effects of joint action.

The potential for over-deterrence stems from the fact that amendments to the Rome Statute do not include any express exceptions for such uses of force. Although supporters of this definition tout its Resolution 3314 pedigree, the amendments to the Statute depart from that instrument in subtle yet significant ways. Most importantly, Resolution 3314—and the U.N. Charter for that matter—envision a continuum of unlawful uses of force, only some of which rise to the level of aggression. Indeed, the Resolution’s preamble states that “aggression is the most serious and dangerous form of the illegal use of force.” The ICC definition, by contrast, envisions that every violation of Article 2(4) of the U.N. Charter as well as violations of a state’s sovereignty (whatever that means) to be acts of aggression that may give rise to prosecution.

F. Chilling Humanitarian Intervention

Taking the perspective of women, the biggest concern is that the codification of the crime of aggression will chill humanitarian interventions. Whereas the concept of self-defense is well established under international law, the right to use force in defense of others is less so. Advocates of an emerging, or surviving, norm in favor of humanitarian intervention raise a host of inter-related arguments. These include textual arguments that attempt to carve out an implicit exception for humanitarian intervention from the language of Article 2(4) of the Charter by noting that states engaging in humanitarian interventions do not seek territorial aggrandizement or to undermine the target state’s political independence—the sovereign values protected by the

---

170 Article 39 of the U.N. Charter envisions three prohibited uses of force: “threat[s] to the peace, breach[es] of the peace, or act[s] of aggression.”
Advocates also raise moral arguments drawing on historical just war and natural law theory, and argue that the post-WWII period ushered in a new normative conception of sovereignty by which adherence to human rights values is now constitutive of statehood and a state that fails to respect these rights forfeits the right to enjoy non-intervention. By this view, sovereign prerogatives of non-intervention and monopolistic territorial power are contingent upon states’ manifesting respect for human rights. Advocates also point to state practice (such as the 1999 Kosovo intervention) and opinio juris (such as the Responsibility to Protect initiative and the African Union Charter) to support an emerging customary international law norm in favor of interventions on purely humanitarian grounds when grave violations are at issue and other efforts (diplomacy, sanctions, etc.) have failed.

Nonetheless, the legality and desirability of humanitarian intervention remains contested, and the aggression amendments have done little to clarify the law in this area. Indeed, even the Kosovo intervention of 1999 (Operation “Allied Force”)—arguably the best example of a bona fide, i.e. non-pretextual, humanitarian intervention—would at first glance meet all the elements of aggression as it has been defined in Article 8bis. Specifically, the intervention was an air war consisting of an attack or bombardment by the armed forces of a State against the territory of another State. Although NATO possessed no territorial ambitions, the intervention did violate the territorial integrity of Yugoslavia and, arguably, sought to undermine the political independence of the state (if not ultimately effectuate regime change). Most, although not all, scholars concede that the intervention was illegal under the Charter framework; many, however, concluded that it was nonetheless legitimate and justifiable under the circumstances, as evidenced by the fact that it generated little in the way of overt censure from other members of the international community. (This non-rejoinder may also be explained, of course, by

---

171 Article 2(4) states: “All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations.”

172 See generally THE MORALITY OF WAR: CLASSICAL AND CONTEMPORARY WRITINGS (Larry May et al., eds. 2006) (compiling excerpts from just war theorists throughout history).

175 See supra note ___.

176 In particular, Article 4 on foundational Principles states that

The Union shall function in accordance with the following principles: ... (h) the right of the Union to intervene in a Member State pursuant to a decision of the Assembly in respect of grave circumstances namely: war crimes, genocide and crimes against humanity.

2000 African Union Charter, http://www.africa-union.org/About_AU/Constitutive_Act.htm#Article4. The full impact of this provision on the legality of humanitarian intervention is unclear given that this text appears alongside an articulation of the principles of sovereign equality of nations, the peaceful resolution of conflicts, the prohibition of the use of force or threat to use force among Member States of the Union, and non-interference.

178 See Article 8bis(2), Resolution RC/Res.6.

179 See INDEPENDENT INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON KOSOVO: THE KOSOVO REPORT, available at http://www.reliefweb.int/library/documents/thekosovoreport.htm (“The Commission concludes that the NATO military intervention was illegal, but legitimate.”).

disparities of power and a wariness to criticize NATO). At the same time, for that matter, the intervention did not receive uniform praise; many post-colonial states remain understandably wary of endorsing a broad right of humanitarian intervention. The intervention was a “manifest” violation if measured by scale and consequences insofar as it wrecked considerable damage on Yugoslavia, but it was not necessarily an errant or flagrant one given lingering debates over its legality, morality, and wisdom.\textsuperscript{181}

Humanitarian interventions may be more susceptible to being chilled than other uses of force of ambiguous legality. \textit{Bona fide} humanitarian interventions are discretionary and may not directly implicate sovereign prerogatives in the way that an action compelled by some visions of self-defense does. The risk of chilling the exercise of such an imperfect duty,\textsuperscript{182} if it can even be called that, is thus greater. Indeed, even in the face of a horrific genocide, the international community found a host of excuses for not intervening more robustly in Rwanda.\textsuperscript{183} The uncertainty surrounding the legality of humanitarian intervention created by its potential penalization threatens to provide just one more excuse for inaction in the face of atrocities. To be sure, creating a set of standards, and eventually a jurisprudence, to judge uses of force may discourage states from undertaking pre-textual humanitarian interventions.\textsuperscript{184} At the same time, the existence of the crime on the books might derail creative thinking geared toward establishing universal standards and designing institutions to manage interventions and protect against abuse.\textsuperscript{185}

Delegates drafting the definition of aggression were not unaware of the potential conflict between the contested doctrine of humanitarian intervention and the crime of aggression. Indeed, the Kosovo intervention occurred just as the Preparatory Commission was starting its work on issues left unfinished at the 1998 Rome Conference. Up until Kampala, delegates preferred to adopt a concerted silence on this point, so as to not jeopardize their forward progress in defining aggression by getting bogged down in already intractable debates over the legality or propriety of humanitarian intervention.

Nonetheless, in Kampala, the United States addressed the issue head on in connection with its objections to the definition of the crime of aggression contained in Article 8bis. In prior diplomatic meetings and again in Kampala, the United States made overtures to reconsider the definition of aggression, but achieved little traction.\textsuperscript{186} Delegates were simply too invested in the \textit{Humanitarian Interventions}, 7 INT’L LEGAL THEORY 27 (2001) (arguing that they are lawful so long as they are sufficiently justified).

\textsuperscript{181}See Petty, \textit{Criminalizing Force}, supra note ___, at 119-130 (arguing that the law regarding humanitarian intervention is too uncertain to satisfy the “manifest” threshold requirement).

\textsuperscript{182}See \textit{Gary Banham, Kant’s Practical Philosophy: From Critique to Doctrine} 186-198 (2006) (discussing Kant’s ideas of imperfect duties).

\textsuperscript{183}SAMANTHA POWER, \textit{“A Problem from Hell”: America and the Age of Genocide} 329-390 (2002) (detailing rationales for the failure intervene in Rwanda).

\textsuperscript{184}See Ryan Goodman, \textit{Humanitarian Intervention And Pretexts For War}, 100 AM. J. INT’L L. 107 (2006) (arguing that states will not exploit an express humanitarian exception to the use of force if they have to justify their actions within a legal test to both international and domestic observers).

\textsuperscript{186}The United States was put in a difficult position to challenge the definition of the crime. Under the administration of President George W. Bush, the United States did not participate in any of the sessions of the Working Group of the Crime of Aggression, even though it was entitled to. Once President Barack Obama took office, it took some time to reformulate the U.S. policy toward the Court, and so the United States missed the Seventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties held in January 2009. The U.S. finally began participating in subsequent sessions, but by definition and its provenance to reopen the debate at such a late date. In the United States’ second formal intervention in Kampala, Harold Hongju Koh, the Department of State Legal Advisor, stated the United States’ view that the definition itself was “flawed,” and that the apparent consensus on the definition of the crime might actually mask significant disagreements in to what types of conduct would constitute the crime of aggression. At the same time, the United States acknowledged that it might be possible to address these concerns without revisiting the definition itself. From that point, the United States focused on achieving key text to be inserted into the amendment package at Annex III, which was slated to contain a number of other interpretive “understandings.” The United States’ proposed understandings sought: to reshape the definition and its future interpretation, to tie the definition more closely to Resolution 3314 and to the U.N. Charter framework governing lawful uses of force, and to preserve an opening for claims about the legality of humanitarian interventions and other arguably legitimate yet potentially unlawful uses of force.

One set of understandings attempted to tether the definition of aggression and its interpretation more closely to certain aspects of General Assembly Resolution 3314. In particular, the United States proposed threshold language to the effect that “it is understood that, consistent with the principles set forth in General Assembly resolution 3314, only the most serious and dangerous forms of illegal use of force are considered to constitute aggression” and “it is only a war of aggression that is a crime against international peace.” As an interpretive guide, the United States proposed language stating that “it is understood that in determining whether an act is manifest, all three components of character, gravity, and scale must be sufficient to justify a ‘manifest’ determination.”

With a second set of understandings, the United States sought to gain acknowledgement that the U.N. Charter recognizes that certain uses of force remain lawful, notwithstanding Article 2(4) of the Charter. Accordingly, one proposed understanding read:

[N]othing in this resolution or the [aggression] amendments ... should be interpreted or applied in any manner inconsistent with General Assembly resolution 3314, nor should they be construed as in any way enlarging or diminishing the scope of the Charter of the United Nations, including its provisions concerning cases in which the use of force is unlawful.

then, the definition enjoyed significant momentum and delegates were loath to allow a latecomer—and a non-state party at that—to reopen the negotiations.

187 Harold H. Koh Intervention, June 4, 2010, available at http://www.state.gov/s/l/releases/remarks/142665.htm (“Although we respect the considerable effort that has gone into the Princeton Process [the intersessional aggression negotiations], we believe that without agreed-upon understandings, the current draft definition remains flawed. We are concerned that the apparent consensus on the wording of Article 8bis masks sharp disagreement on particular points regarding the meaning of that language that must be addressed before the amendments on the crime of aggression can enter into force.”).

188 Id. (noting that the proposals “introduce the idea of addressing concerns through understandings or other documents, without the need for disturbing the language of Article 8bis itself.”).

189 The Preamble of Resolution 3314 notes that “aggression is the most serious and dangerous form of the illegal use of force.”

190 See supra note ___ [GA 3314 discussion re: war of aggression]. See also Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation Among States in Accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, G.A. Res. 2526 (1970), available at http://www.hku.edu/law/conlawhk/conlaw/outline/Outline4/2625.htm (proclaiming that a “war of aggression constitutes a crime against the peace, for which there is responsibility under international law.”).
More pointedly, another proposed understanding stated:

It is understood that, for purposes of the Statute, an act cannot be considered a manifest violation of the United Nations Charter absent a showing that it was undertaken without the consent of the relevant state, was not taken in self-defense, and was not within any authorization provided by the United Nations Security Council.

A third set of understandings implicitly or explicitly attempted to carve out an exception for the doctrine of humanitarian intervention. First, the United States sought recognition of the fact that “a determination whether an act of aggression has been committed requires consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case, including the purposes for which force was used and the gravity of the acts concerned or their consequences.” The reference to “purposes” provided a potential opening to argue for the legality of humanitarian interventions. Another proposed understanding drew upon the definition of “manifest” from the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. This proposed understanding was more explicit in addressing humanitarian intervention:

It is understood that, for purposes of the Statute, an act cannot be considered to be a manifest violation of the United Nations Charter unless it would be objectively evident to any State conducting itself in the matter in accordance with normal practice and in good faith, and thus an act undertaken in connection with an effort to prevent the commission of any of the crimes contained in Articles 6, 7 or 8 of the Statute would not constitute an act of aggression.

These proposals were repackaged into two draft understandings for consideration by delegates in informal negotiations. The first proposal considered, Understanding X, combined the reference to the most serious and dangerous uses of force and the need to consider all of the circumstances including the purpose for which forces was used. Understanding X proved to be controversial. In particular, a few states led by Iran argued that the introduction of the subjective element of “purpose” in considering the legality of uses of force threatened to compromise the entire process and amend the U.N. Charter by the back door. Detractors questioned what other purposes besides self-defense were lawful under the Charter. The United States at first acceded to the removal of the term “purpose,” but later reserved on the record the right to re-open the question of a more explicit mention of humanitarian intervention, although it did not ever do so in a formal setting. Additional bilateral meetings were held at which time consensus was reached on Understanding X. The second, Understanding Y, mandated the cumulative interpretation of the factors of character, gravity, and scale.

---

191 See supra note ___.
192 A member of the German delegation was asked to chair the process to consider these proposed understandings. After a series of informal discussions, the chair brought forward only some of the proposals for further consideration and debate in a special working group session on June 9, 2010, explaining his “minimalist” approach on the fact certain the other understandings “met with significant reluctance.”
193 Ironically, these meetings involved negotiations between the United States and Iran, two nonparty states who have gone head-to-head over allegations of aggression. See Oil Platforms (Islamic Rep. of Iran v. U.S.), Judgment of 6 November 2003, 2003 I.C.J. 161.
Eventually, the two Understandings appeared in the final text of the amendments\(^\text{194}\) as follows:

1. It is understood that aggression is the most serious and dangerous form of the illegal use of force; and that a determination whether an act of aggression has been committed requires consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case, including the gravity of the acts concerned and their consequences, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. …
7. It is understood that in establishing whether an act of aggression constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations, the three components of character, gravity and scale must be sufficient to justify a “manifest” determination. No one component can be significant enough to satisfy the manifest standard by itself.

It remains to be seen whether and how the adopted understandings will influence prosecutions before the Court in light of their uncertain legal authority.\(^\text{195}\) The proposed but un-adopted understandings no doubt served some pedagogical purpose among delegations, but their impact on the travaux préparatoires remains ambiguous. Some delegations supported the content or impulse behind the rejected understandings, but deemed them unnecessary or superfluous; others expressed concerns as to their very content. Given this ambiguous record, it will be for the various organs and constituencies of the ICC—including the prosecutor exercising prosecutorial discretion—to determine how to address future humanitarian interventions. By virtue of this de facto delegation of interpretive authority,\(^\text{196}\) the ICC is thus poised to play a role as arbiter on the legality of humanitarian interventions. At a minimum, the equivocal record suggests that the \(^{194}\) Resolution RC/Res.6, supra note ___, at 6.

\(^{195}\) Article 21 of the Rome Statute, which sets forth sources of law for the Court, does not mention understandings. Likewise, Article 120 prohibits reservations. Nor can the Rome Statute be amended through the adoption of understandings. Rather, the understandings constitute an agreement among those States present in Kampala as to how the aggression amendments should be interpreted and what meaning should be ascribed to certain terms. As such, while not binding \textit{per se}, such an agreement among negotiating states is certainly useful as an interpretive tool and should be considered highly persuasive. For a discussion, see this thread: Kevin Jon Heller, \textit{Are the Understandings Valid?}, OPINIO JURIS, http://opiniojuris.org/2010/06/16/are-the-aggression-understandings-valid/ (arguing that they should be ignored by the judges); Kevin John Heller, \textit{Why the VCLT Does Not Save Understanding Seven}, OPINIO JURIS, http://opiniojuris.org/2010/06/16/why-the-vclt-does-not-save-understanding-seven/ (arguing that the understandings are not “a subsequent agreement” among parties within the meaning of Article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties); Marko Milanovic on Understandings, OPINIO JURIS, http://opiniojuris.org/2010/06/16/marko-milanovic-on-understandings/ (arguing that the Court must consider the understandings as part of the interpretive framework for the treaty). Understandings were also employed in connection with the United Nations Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and their Property. U.N. Doc. A/RES/59/38. See David P. Stewart, \textit{Current Development: The UN Convention On Jurisdictional Immunities Of States And Their Property}, 99 AM. J. INT’L L. 194, 209 (2005) (“These understandings formed a critical component of the negotiated solution to various substantive difficulties. In interpreting the convention, the annexed understandings therefore need to be given careful attention.”). \textit{See generally ANTHONY AUST, MODERN TREATY LAW AND PRACTICE} 237 (2007) (discussing the validity of agreements relating to a treaty made at the conclusion of the negotiations).
Court should consider both potential meanings of “manifest”—seriousness and legal certainty—in the aggression context.

One avenue for creating an opening for humanitarian interventions and other potentially lawful or legitimate uses of force that was not fully explored would have been to tinker with the mens rea element of the crime of aggression either with respect to the definition of the “crime of aggression” or even the state “act of aggression” as suggested by the United States’ proposal to include reference to the state’s “purpose” in engaging in the purported act of aggression, bearing in mind the difficulty of attributing an “intention” to an artificial entity like a state. As it stands, the definition of “crime of aggression” contains an objective intention/knowledge formulation: the defendant must intend to commit an enumerated act of aggression (bombardment, etc.) and must have knowledge of the factual circumstances that render the act a manifest violation of the Charter. The defendant need not, however, have knowledge of legal doctrine concerning the use of force. If drafters in Kampala had followed much of the Nuremberg jurisprudence and required proof of a heightened level of intent—such as a specific intent or motive element to achieve an illegitimate territorial acquisition or political aim or even require some showing of bad faith, malice, willfulness, or hostile intent—they might have provided an additional element to enable the Court to avoid entering into the humanitarian intervention fray and potentially altering the debate through its jurisprudence.

As a result of the rejection of the reference to “purpose” in the factors governing the legality of acts of aggression, no notion of intent or motive has been included with reference to the state act of aggression, either. Along the lines of a prior but abandoned German

---

198 See supra note ___.
199 In the High Command Case, adjudicated pursuant to CCL 10, the tribunal stated that the lawful or unlawful character of a war turns on its purpose: “Whether a war be lawful, or aggressive and therefore unlawful under international law, is and can be determined only from a consideration of factors that entered into its initiation. In the intent and purpose for which it is planned, prepared, initiated, and waged is to be found its lawfulness or unlawfulness.” Von Leeb, supra note __, at 486.
200 The issue of whether some element of specific hostile intent is inherent to the crime of aggression arose in German legal proceedings in connection with the Kosovo intervention. The German Penal Code at Article 80 penalizes “crimes against the peace” and states: “Whoever prepares a war of aggression … in which the Federal Republic of Germany is supposed to participate and thereby creates a danger of war for the Federal Republic of Germany, shall be punished with imprisonment for life or for not less than ten years.” Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch, StGB) (Nov. 13, 1998) (Ger.), available at http://www.iuscomp.org/gla/statutes/StGB.htm. Claims brought under these code sections to prevent Germany’s participation in the Kosovo intervention were rejected on the ground that the purpose of that intervention was to halt crimes against humanity, whereas those code sections were concerned with the preservation of the peace. One commentator, later appointed a Judge of the Federal Constitutional Court of Germany, noted:

Aggressive war was distinguished from a mere violation of the prohibition on the use of force by the specific intent required, namely to disturb the peaceful coexistence of peoples. Thus, the benign motives of NATO action were deemed to be sufficient to exculpate the German government—an argument usually not sustained under German criminal law.

proposal,202 “act of aggression” could have been defined with reference to a state policy’s willfulness or hostile intent. In the alternative, the definition could have listed a series of prohibited purposes, such as conquest, establishing a military occupation in the victim state, launching a war of aggression, achieving the annexation of the other state’s territory, acquiring the other state’s material resources, undermining the political independence of the state, ousting a state leadership, or violating a state’s neutrality.203

Another avenue to address these concerns would have been to rework the defenses to more clearly allow for a consideration of whether the individual or state was motivated by the defense of others at the time of the act of aggression. Although self-defense and the defense of others appear as defenses in Article 31 of the Rome Statute,204 these articles do not easily accommodate “defenses” that might be raised by the putative aggressor state at the stage in the proceedings at which the state act of aggression is under consideration. Presumably, that the predicate state action was in fact a lawful use of force could be raised by the defendant at trial pursuant to Article 31(3), assuming the absence of conflicts of interest between the defendant and the aggressor state government. It is unclear procedurally, however, whether either the impugned state or the victim state will have standing to participate in the aggression determination by the Pre-Trial Division absent amendment to the Statute or Rules of Procedure.205

As it stands, the only way for any party to address potentially unlawful but nonetheless legitimate uses of force is with reference to the tripartite factors of character, gravity, and scale. Drafters did not consider how these factors should be defined, leaving it to the Court for interpretation. Being close to synonymous, both gravity and scale seem to refer to the severity, magnitude, and consequences of a particular use of force. The term “character,” as a more qualitative term, is the most elastic of the three factors and might provide an opening to argue that an act of aggression was not committed with hostile intent or for aggressive purposes.

---

202 See, e.g., Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court, Proposal Submitted by Germany, UN Doc. PCNICC/1999/DP.13 (July 30, 1999).
204 See supra note __.
205 Delegates did not consider how the extant procedures governing the initiation of proprio motu investigations in Article 15 will need to be adapted to the aggression determination by the Pre-Trial Division. Most importantly, as it now stands, Article 15 does not give any participatory rights to states, although subsection 3 permits victims to make representations, and subsection 2 invites the Prosecutor to seek additional information and testimony from states, U.N. organs, non-governmental organizations, and other reliable sources in order to determine the “seriousness" of the information received. By contrast, states are entitled to challenge the jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to Article 19(2)(b), but only on complementarity grounds. The Article 15 process is designed to occur prior to the identification of particular defendants; accordingly, there is no provision for an accused to participate in this process. Absent some amendment or procedural rule to govern the aggression context, it appears that there will be no opportunity for an accused to raise arguments on behalf of the supposed aggressor state at the time of the initial aggression determination.
G. Intervening on Behalf of Women

For those of us concerned about augmenting international law’s ability to protect women, should we care about over-deterring humanitarian interventions and other uses of force that do not rise to the level of an aggressive war or hostile attack? Many strains of feminism—whether based on an affirmative essentialism or premised on theories of differential socialization—are closely tied to pacifism in rejecting the masculinist impulse to resort to arms in the face of conflict. The temptation to invoke armed humanitarian intervention in the face of atrocities may limit our ability to imagine, design, and implement other non-violent forms of conflict resolution. The idea of humanitarian intervention also furthers a victim narrative by portraying women as in need of a male savior. That said, anyone who is the innocent victim of violence deserves to be rescued from her predicament, and encouraging women to exercise their autonomy and agency is simply folly when they are looking down the barrel of a gun. While humanitarian interventions are ostensibly protective, they are—after all—guarantees of more violence, at least in the short term (if not longer). Such operations still valorize militarism and entail the use of armed force, which is capable of causing great destruction, injuring civilians, and destroying societies. Doing so in the name of humanitarianism or women does not negate

---

206 For a discussion, see Karen Engle, “Calling in the Troops”: The Uneasy Relationship Among Women’s Rights, Human Rights, and Humanitarian Intervention, 20 HARV. HUM. RTS. J. 189 (2007) (“I am uneasy with the idea that destroying life and infrastructure is a way to demonstrate concern for a particular place or situation, especially when most of history has shown that such intervention—regardless of motivation—rarely improves the lives of the individuals who are the stated subjects of intervention.”).

209 See Engle, supra note ___ at 217-224 (discussing debates among human rights organizations and feminists about the need to intervene militarily in the face of atrocities).

210 Gardam, supra note ___, at 265 (noting that the use of force is the “most overly destructive expression of the power of the state”).
the harm caused. Given these considerations, it is unlikely that feminist thinkers will ever universally come to terms with the idea of a just war.

Nonetheless, is it possible to envision a beneficial humanitarian intervention on behalf of women? One requirement would be that such an intervention would result in the diminution rather than escalation of violence. Although humanitarian interventions involve armed force, one can surmise that just wars might ultimately produce less collateral damage due to the fact that combatants and their commanders are likely to assign different values to the variables employed in the proportionality calculus (military utility and the risk of collateral harm) than their aggressive adversaries. These variables are elastic by design and provide a certain degree of latitude to combatants to implement military strategy. Arguably, those involved in non-hostile uses of force might demand a greater degree of military necessity to justify a course of conduct or tolerate less potential for collateral harm in choosing their targets. Indeed, an argument could be made that combatants engaged in a humanitarian intervention should be subject to heightened duties under the jus in bello in light of their ulterior protective purposes —another instance of the melding of the jus in bello and the jus ad bellum.

There thus exists the potential that the codification of the crime will over-deter uses of force that would otherwise be employed on women’s behalf. Never, however, has the substantial denial of women’s rights—whether civil, political, economic, social, or cultural—served as the sole or primary basis for a humanitarian intervention. Many feminists, however, have fought for a more robust intervention in conflict zones where women were at risk. These calls began 211 The Kosovo intervention, for example, resulted in multiple incidents of “collateral damage” that may have risen to the level of war crimes. After a preliminary examination, the Prosecutor of the ICTY, Louise Arbour, ultimately declined to launch a formal investigation into these incidents—a decision that was not without controversy. See Final Report to the Prosecutor by the Committee Established to Review the NATO Bombing Campaign Against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, http://www.icty.org/x/file/About/OTP/otp_report_nato_bombing_en.pdf [hereinafter “NATO Bombing Report”]; Paolo Benvenuti, The ICTY Prosecutor and the Review of the NATO Bombing Campaign Against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, 12 EUR. J. INT’L L. 503 (2001) (criticizing Prosecutor’s methodology and results). Her reasoning for not prosecuting was somewhat ambiguous, premised as it was on a complex set of conclusions that “[i]n all cases, either the law is not sufficiently clear or investigations are unlikely to result in the acquisition of sufficient evidence to substantiate charges against high level accused or against lower accused for particularly heinous offences.” NATO Bombing Report, supra note __, at para. 90. No doubt power politics also impacted her decision, as prosecutions would not have been politically feasible, given the Tribunal’s Security Council provenance.

---

213 Protocol I, Article 51(5)(b).

214 Ruti Teitel, The Wages of Just War, 39 CORNELL INT’L L. J. 689, 695 (2006). But see Sassoli, supra note __, at 249-250 (“in an armed conflict labeled a ‘humanitarian intervention’, a stricter proportionality analysis applies only in the overall jus ad bellum proportionality analysis, not for the proportionality which must be respected under the ius in bello for every single attack.”) (citations removed).

215 Chinkin, supra note __, at 290 (“Oppression and acts of brutality towards women have never been regarded in the same light as slavery, genocide and apartheid”) and 291 (“The invisibility of women in any legal justifications for the use of force is striking.”).

216 See MacKinnon, supra note __.
anew when the Taliban began imposing a form of gender apartheid\textsuperscript{217} in Afghanistan.\textsuperscript{218} It was not until the attacks of September 11\textsuperscript{th}, however, that the United States mobilized an intervention in Afghanistan, which was accused of harboring elements of Al Qaida. At that time, the rhetoric surrounding the intervention appropriated feminist concerns about the plight of women under the target government in the service of garnering the support of domestic and international constituencies for the military response.\textsuperscript{219} To be sure, situations in which interventions have been launched or considered involved violations of women’s rights that might have been alleviated with a halt to violence or a change of regime.\textsuperscript{220} That said, interventions that did go forward have not necessarily benefited women across the board. It is now clear that women in Afghanistan have not always fared better following the partial ouster of the Taliban, the enactment of a new Constitution, and the ratification of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women.\textsuperscript{221} Nor were the women of Kuwait liberated along with their country by Operation Desert Storm.\textsuperscript{222} Given this history, it is difficult to support a feminist vision of humanitarian intervention on behalf of women under contemporary conditions, when women are so often excluded from decisions about uses of force. Humanitarian intervention may be more palatable to feminists, and ultimately more beneficial to women, were women included in their design and implementation.

H. Ending Conflicts

In addition to enabling the prosecution of the architects of acts of aggression, the crime of aggression may serve another useful purpose in providing a crime for which amnesties could be strategically offered to exact peace from warring parties and to encourage leaders to order their subordinates to lay down their arms. In this way, the ability to charge potential defendants for the crime of aggression may reduce conflict not via deterrence, but more indirectly as a tool for negotiators once conflict has already begun. All civilians will benefit if such amnesties can shorten armed conflicts.

Although controversial, amnesties have proved to be useful in effectuating processes of transitional justice in formerly repressive regimes and in demobilizing rebels in the context of non-international armed conflicts. As a condition of relinquishing power, the government of General Augusto Pinochet, for example, granted its agents an amnesty in 1978 for any acts committed by government agents in Chile and abroad. Likewise, the amnesty-for-truth tradeoff was central to the negotiated solution in South Africa that enabled the dismantling of apartheid. Many human rights organizations oppose the use of amnesties for grave human 223 Chinkin, supra note ___, at 279 (“The reality of who is making those decisions [on behalf of the state] and the effect of those decisions upon individuals within States may well take on a different perspective when examined from a gendered viewpoint.”).

---

224 Lucinda J. Peck, An Alternative to Pacifism? Feminism and Just War Theory, 9 HYPATIA 152 (1994) (noting that women are absent from legal and ethical inquiries about war).
225 The Allies did not, for example, prosecute Emperor Hirohito of Japan, notwithstanding that he was viewed by many as the architect of Japanese imperialism. There is speculation that General MacArthur thought the occupation would proceed more smoothly with the emperor in place, albeit with a renunciation of any claims to divinity. The President of the Tribunal (Judge Webb) and the French judge (Judge Bernard) objected in their dissents to the exclusion of the emperor and, as late as 1950, the Soviets advocated for the creation of a special court to try the emperor and other officials who had escaped indictment.
226 See Carlos Nino, The Duty to Punish Past Abuses of Human Rights Put into Context: The Case of Argentina, 100 Yale L.J. 2619 (1991). One clear exception is Article IX of the 1999 Lomé Peace Agreement in Sierra Leone which neither ended the civil war there nor deterred atrocities. See Peace Agreement Between the Government Of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front Of Sierra Leone, available at http://www.sierra-leone.org/lomeaccord.html (“To consolidate the peace and promote the cause of national reconciliation, the Government of Sierra Leone shall ensure that no official or judicial action is taken against any member of the RUF/SL, ex-AFRC, ex-SLA or CDF [various militia groups] in respect of anything done by them in pursuit of their objectives as members of those organizations since March 1991, up to the signing of the present Agreement.”).
227 See Article 6(5), Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts (June 8, 1977) (“At the end of hostilities, the authorities in power shall endeavour to grant the broadest possible amnesty to persons who have participated in the armed conflict, or those deprived of their liberty for reasons related to the armed conflict, whether they are interned or detained.”).
228 See Decree-Law No. 2.191, Diario Oficial No. 30.042 (Apr. 19, 1978) (Chile) stating that (“amnesty is granted to all persons who, as authors, accomplices or accessories, committed crimes during the period of the State of Siege, comprised between September 11, 1973 and Mar. 10, 1978”).
rights violations under the majority of circumstances, arguing that they further impunity and undercut domestic and international efforts to deter future gross violations of human rights. 230 Most, but not all, 231 domestic courts that have reviewed their own amnesties have upheld their legality. 232 By contrast, all human rights bodies 233 and international criminal tribunals 234 have ruled that amnesties for war crimes, crimes against humanity or genocide violate fundamental principles of justice, including the right of victims to access to justice and truth before a court of law.

As it stands, amnesties for the core atrocity crimes—genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes—are generally considered unlawful under international law 235 and thus are foreclosed as an international negotiating tactic. Most studies of the legality of amnesties do not include aggression within the list of non-amnestiable crimes, 236 suggesting that this may be one ICC crime when an amnesty might be employed by international negotiators and upheld by the ICC. Of course, this view reflected the fact that aggression has not been criminally charged since World War II. This apparent opinio juris may change once the crime becomes prosecutable before the ICC. Promising leaders amnesty from potential prosecution for the crime of aggression may provide a carrot for peace talks and negotiations. 237 To be sure, other states and international tribunals are not obliged to respect amnesties awarded by domestic authorities. 238

234 See Decision on Appeal against Provisional Detention Order of Ieng Sary, ECCC, Pre Trial Chamber, Case No. 002/19-09-2007-ECCC/OCJ (PTC03) (October 17, 2008) (finding that the offenses applicable to amnesty under Cambodian law were not the equivalent of the crimes prosecutable before the ECCC); Prosecutor v. Kallon, Case No. SCSL–2004–15–AR72(E), Decision on Challenge to Jurisdiction: Lomé Accord Amnesty (Mar. 13, 2004) (refusing to apply Sierra Leonean amnesty).
238 ANTONIO CASSESE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW 315 (2003) (“if a court of another State having in custody persons accused of international crimes decide [sic] to prosecute them although in their national State they would
And yet, an amnesty targeted to a potential ICC prosecution may be effective when leaders are unlikely to be prosecuted for aggression in any domestic court.

I. Distractions and Detractions

Human rights groups, international criminal law personnel, government representatives, and academics have raised concerns that adding the crime of aggression at this early stage in the Court’s life will detract time and attention from the atrocity crimes, which routinely go unpunished both domestically and internationally and which more directly address gender-based violence. Many groups fear the Court will become bogged down in trying to understand the causes of war—inquiries deemed outside the Court’s current institutional competency—rather than in prosecuting war’s consequences. Indeed, the crimes against the peace charge was the linchpin of the Nuremberg and Tokyo indictments and the centerpiece of the final judgments. Notwithstanding the enormity of the Holocaust, the majority of the benefit from an amnesty law, such court would not thereby act contrary to general international law, in particular to the principle of respect for the sovereignty of other States.

239 Human Rights Watch, Making Kampala Count: Advancing the Global Fight Against Impunity at the ICC Review Conference 99 (2010), available at http://www.reliefweb.int/rw/lib.nsf/id/db900sid/DNEO-85CCT2/$file/Full_Report.pdf?openelement. A consortium of human rights organizations, many based in Africa from which all of the current cases before the Court hail, expressed concerns about overburdening the Court. In a letter to foreign ministers, this group argued:

[A]sking the ICC to take on another category of crime at present risks overburdening the Court when it is still striving to prosecute and try those responsible for current crimes. Much work is needed to further improve the operation of the Rome Statute system in respect of cooperation, complementarity, the impact on victims and affected communities, and questions of peace and justice. ... Prudently declining to adopt an amendment on aggression at this time, when the Court has such urgent challenges to tackle, is the most effective way to strengthen an institution that is central to combating impunity, and ensuring accountability, for the most heinous international crimes.”

240 Richard Goldstone, Op-Ed, Prosecuting Aggression, INTERNATIONAL HERALD TRIBUNE (May 26, 2010) (“as a young institution, the Court still has much work to do in effectively investigating and prosecuting the crimes over which it already exercises jurisdiction. Cooperation from member states and the relationship between peace and justice are just two vital issues that require sustained attention at Kampala and beyond.”), available at http://www.nytimes.com/2010/05/27/opinion/27iht-edpoint.html?_r=1. Justice Goldstone was Chief Prosecutor of the ICTY in the early days of that institution’s life.

Nuremberg judgment is devoted to condemning the aggressive acts of Germany—including the invasions of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, and Belgium—in violation of the Kellogg-Briand Pact, various bilateral treaties and assurances of non-aggression, and declarations of neutrality. Likewise, the crimes against humanity and war crimes allegations at Tokyo received short shrift in the Tokyo judgment, leading to the invisibility of many crimes committed against civilians in general and women in particular.

Although the Court has made important advances to date (especially in flushing out its procedural framework), it does not yet have much to show for its eight years of existence. There are, as yet, no verdicts on the merits. The trials of only three of the six defendants in custody are ongoing, but troubled. Only a handful of defendants is in custody while others flout their arrest warrants. Indeed, none of the Ugandan defendants is in custody despite the fact that these were the first indictments issued. An indictment was not confirmed in one of the Sudanese cases, the high level defendants are at large, the African Union came out against the indictment of Al Bashir (although it has been suggested the Libya hijacked that proceedings that generated the earlier policy statement), and aid groups find it difficult to reach those in need in Darfur. The indictments themselves are of more limited scope than comparable indictments before the ad hoc tribunals, although almost all are commendable for their integration of charges of gender-based violence. This fear that the inclusion of the crime of aggression in its Statute will distract the Court is especially real given that the Assembly of States Parties has allocated no additional resources to the Court to prosecute this new, controversial, and qualitatively different crime. Arguably, to effectively prosecute the crime of aggression, the various organs of the Court 244 See Nuremberg Judgment, supra note ___, at 186-224.

247 The Prosecutor v. Bahar Idriss Abu Garda, Case No. ICC-02/05-02/09, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges (Feb. 8, 2010) (concluding that the evidence presented did not establish substantial grounds to believe that the suspect committed the charged crimes). The Prosecutor’s motion for leave to appeal—which argued that the Pre-Trial Chamber had applied incorrect methods and criteria for evaluating the evidence—was denied. Prosecutor v. Bahar Idriss Abu Garda, Case No. ICC-02/05-02/09-267, Decision on the “Prosecutor’s Application for Leave to Appeal the ‘Decision on Confirmation of Charges’” (Apr. 23, 2010).
250 See Office of the Prosecutor, Draft for Discussion: Criteria for Selection of Situations and Cases 9-10 (June 2006) (“the OTP will bring a relatively limited number of cases that are representative of the overall scope of the crime, against those bearing the greatest responsibility for the most serious crimes”).
will need to hire staff with appropriate experience and skill sets to evaluate aggression referrals and evidence. Depending on how often the Court faces aggression claims, it may also be necessary to alter the mix of judges to include more experts in public international law at the expense of experts in criminal law and procedure, human rights, humanitarian law (the jus in bello), or violence against women and children.\(^{252}\)

In addition to overwhelming the Court, investigating and prosecuting the crime of aggression may further politicize the institution, undermining its ability to undertake its core mandate.\(^{253}\) One fear is that states will use their referral powers opportunistically to trigger investigations into inter-state grievances over territory, foreign policies, arms control, the drug trade, secessionist movements, and the like.\(^{254}\) The risk that states parties will manipulate the Court for their own ends is perhaps more acute now that delegates have decided not to allow an exclusive Security Council filter for state referral cases and instead empower the Pre-Trial Division to approve aggression charges in the event of Security Council inaction.\(^{255}\) The Council’s five permanent members—Great Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States—and some of their close allies had favored a system that allowed the Security Council to serve as a gatekeeper to any prosecution for aggression. Detractors had worried that such an arrangement would undermine judicial independence, render the Court a tool for the Security Council, and lead to unequal justice.\(^{256}\) At the same time, the Council might have been in a better position than the Pre-Trial Division to ferret out abusive or fallacious claims that are more likely to exacerbate international tensions than alleviate them. Indeed, externalizing the filter process to the Council may have actually decreased actual or potential politicization by allowing the Court to focus on the attribution of individual criminal liability rather than inserting it into political disputes that may give rise to the perception of bias.

V. Conclusion

Notwithstanding this hyper-visibility in the post-WWII period, crimes against the peace all but disappeared from the international criminal law pantheon in the Cold War period. The international community is now poised to recommit to prosecuting the crime, thus completing \(^{252}\) Rome Statute, Article 36 (setting forth the qualifications of judges).

\(^{253}\) Human Rights Watch, supra note ___, at 99 (“Taking up prosecutions of aggression could link the ICC to highly politicized disputes, such as border incursions, territorial disputes, and secession movements supported by external state actors. Inserting the court into these disputes may well give rise to perceptions of political bias and instrumentalization—even if such perceptions are wholly unfounded. This, in turn, could damage the interested public’s trust in the court’s legitimacy and ability to address genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity.’”).
\(^{254}\) In this way, having an international court in which to initiate prosecutions for the crime of aggression against individuals may also diminish the invocation of principles of state responsibility in other fora, such as the International Court of Justice. Indeed, “[i]nternational criminal prosecutions enable the state to be rehabilitated through the criminalization of a particular regime.” Buss, Feminist, supra note ___, at ___ (citing GERRY SIMPSON, LAW, WAR AND CRIME: WAR CRIMES TRIAL AND THE REINVENTION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW ch. 3 (2007)). This, in turn, may undercut claims for more broad-based reparations or more far-reaching structural reforms in the aggressive state. At the same time, a ruling by the ICC that a state committed an act of aggression may provide a precedential platform for such claims.
\(^{255}\) See supra note ___.
the Nuremberg legacy and fully adapting the Nuremberg Principles to the modern era.\footnote{Principles of International Law Recognized in the Charter of the Nüremberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal (1950), available at http://www.icrc.org/ihl.nsf/FULL/390?OpenDocument.} If we care about what happens to women in war, we should do everything in our power to decrease the incidence of war in the first place. It is too early to tell whether the inclusion of the crime of aggression in the Rome Statute will be able to do this. Indeed, this article has reached no firm conclusion on how feminists should think about the whether the newly codified crime of aggression will improve the lives of women. Both the definition of the crime and the jurisdictional regime contain elements that may be helpful, neutral, or even harmful to the interests of women.

Certainly prosecuting the crime of aggression is not the only, or even best, way to decrease inter-state violence. But, it is the path that the international community is now on.\footnote{Buss, supra note ___, at ___. (“When faced with an existing institutional apparatus … feminist advocates often do not have the luxury of opting out. The realm of legal and political work for feminists has, to a degree, already been defined.”).} Once again, we find ourselves asking the “woman question” in a reactive posture\footnote{Bartlett, supra note ___, at 836, 837.} and engaging in a continuing task of determining how legal doctrines and frameworks—which women played little hand in generating—affect women. Although at this early stage, I am left holding contradictory thoughts about the utility of codifying the crime of aggression, at a minimum, a number of pitfalls to incorporating the aggression amendments into the Rome Statute are already visible. These should be kept on the forefront of our minds and conversations as this crime is operationalized and a procedural regime is developed for its prosecution. Since this is a path that the international community is on, we should endeavor to make sure it goes in the right direction. Moreover, we should not lose sight of alternative solutions to ending violence as we imagine a more peaceful world. The world’s women deserve nothing less.