Florida State University

From the SelectedWorks of Chad G. Marzen

2016

Insurance Coverage and Custom Farming

Chad G. Marzen

Available at: https://works.bepress.com/chad_marzen/28/
Insurance Coverage and Custom Farming

Chad G. Marzen

I. Introduction

The success of agriculture is vital for the success and growth of the rural economy in the United States. As with many industries, the field of agriculture is quite diverse, ranging from traditional agriculture, sustainable agriculture, and urban agriculture to the new and emerging... industry of agricultural tourism which opens the doors to agricultural experiences beyond the picturesque white picket fence gates of a family farm.

Just as there are many different types of agriculture, various farming arrangements exist. Perhaps the most traditional technique is the farmer that purchases and owns his or her own land, his or her own equipment, and then harvests the crops on his/her own. While owning farmland has its advantages in terms of flexibility and utilization of the land, land prices are expensive and the start-up costs are immense for young farmers seeking entry into agriculture. Although land prices may make it prohibitive for a farmer to purchase land outright, an option that creates more flexibility to expend capital in other areas such as machinery is the option to lease farmland. With a lease, the owner of the farmland exchanges the right to utilize the farmland to 6 For a comprehensive discussion of various state agritourism statutes, see Terence J. Centner, Liability Concerns: Agritourism Operators Seek a Defense Against Damages Resulting from Inherent Risks, 19 KAN. J.L. & PUB. POL’Y 102 (2009). For instance, Utah has defined agritourism in UTAH CODE ANN. § 78B-4-512(b) (West 2016) as “the travel or visit by the general public to a working farm, ranch, or other commercial agricultural, aquacultural, horticultural, or forestry operation for the enjoyment of, education about, or participation in the activities of the farm, ranch, or other commercial agricultural, aquacultural, horticultural, or forestry operation”).

---

9 See Alicia Meuleners, Note, Finding Fields: Opportunities to Facilitate and Incentivize the Transfer of Agricultural Property to New and Beginning Farmers, 18 DRAKE J. AGRIC. L. 211, 212 (2013) (“As access to productive land is arguably the core of the agricultural industry, much attention has been given to processes by which land ownership can be made more affordable. With the support and enthusiasm of state governments and environmental and sustainability interest groups, Congress has explored various opportunities to assist new farmers and provide a competitive edge to a group generally lacking much of the equipment, capital, and bargaining power of established agricultural operations. Through the development of loan financing and credit systems, policymakers have sought to offset this significant, if not prohibitive, hurdle facing new farmers, and provide start-up operations with a competitive boost in an aggressive real property market”).

another individual or entity in exchange for rent.\textsuperscript{11} Two general types of leases in farming include the cash rent lease and the crop share lease.\textsuperscript{12} In a cash rent lease, the farmer pays the landowner a set rate per acre or a set ret for the entire property in exchange for the ability to plant and harvest the crops on the land.\textsuperscript{13} With a crop share lease, the landowner receives a percentage of the actual crop, typically depending upon local custom.\textsuperscript{14} In addition to the two general types of leases, a third type of lease, the “hybrid” lease, combines elements of both the cash rent and crop share lease.\textsuperscript{15}

Yet another option for farming, an option that is popular in the Midwest, is that of custom farming.\textsuperscript{16} With custom farming, a landowner pays a custom operator a set rate to complete all the mechanical operations on the farm.\textsuperscript{17} In a custom farming arrangement, the landowner

\begin{footnotes}
\textsuperscript{11} Id. ("A lease is a legally enforceable contract allowing the owner of real property, equipment, and/or livestock to convey the right to use that property to a person in exchange for rent. The lease defines the rights between the landlord and the tenant, and defines how the landlord/tenant relationship will operate").

\textsuperscript{13} Id. ("In a typical cash rent lease situation, the tenant is obligated to pay a set price per acre or a set rate for the leased property. With this form of lease, the tenant bears certain economic risks, and the landlord is guaranteed a predictable return, regardless of commodity prices. The landlord does carry the risks of the tenant’s not paying the rent or using farming practices that reap short-term benefits from the land. Parties can negotiate terms to help limit their exposure to these risks, the tenant can negotiate for flexible rent terms, and the landlord can include terms that specify the type of farming practices that should be used").

\textsuperscript{14} Id. ("With a crop-share lease, the landlord receives a share of the crops produced in exchange for the use of the land by the tenant. The amount of the share typically depends on local custom. The landlord usually agrees to pay a portion of the input costs under a crop-share lease. This type of lease exposes the landlord to more risk but does allow the landlord to benefit if commodity prices or production increase. The crop-share lease also allows the tenant to spread the risk of reduced yields and price risk and reduces the amount of capital needed for the operation").

\textsuperscript{15} Id.

\textsuperscript{17} See Kent Thiesse, Custom farming agreements gain popularity, require communication, TRI-STATE NEIGHBOR (Apr. 8, 2015), http://www.tristateneighbor.com/news/regional/custom-farming-agreements-gain-popularity-require-communication/article_a5212348-d88c-11e4-87c4-77a0e4d5bc3f.html
\end{footnotes}
provides all the seed and fertilize for the custom operator, but typically retains the profits produced from the farm.\textsuperscript{18} Custom farming is also an arrangement that is utilized in livestock production as well.\textsuperscript{19} Some farms utilize custom feeding arrangements for livestock production, where a custom feeder provides a facility and labor to care for the livestock while the other farmer provides feed and veterinary services.\textsuperscript{20}

With any agricultural operation, a proper risk management tool farmers can utilize to better manage liability risk is obtaining adequate insurance coverage. At least one commentator has comprehensively analyzed the provisions of the farmer’s comprehensive liability policy.\textsuperscript{21} However, there is a gap in the literature relating to legal issues involving insurance coverage and custom farming. This article is intended to fill in the gap in the literature and provide a comprehensive examination of several key issues relating to insurance and custom farming which have been litigated. Insurance coverage and custom farming intersect in a number of areas such as the agricultural use of an automobile, the duty to procure insurance coverage, whether the training of a horse constitutes custom farming, which particular activities constitute custom farming, and the effect of custom farming exclusions and endorsements in insurance policies.

\textsuperscript{18} Id.

II. “Farm Use” and Automobile Liability Policies

In some cases, custom farming is involved in questions of whether an insured was engaged in a “farm use” and within the scope of their insurance policy covering “farm use.” “Farm use” of a truck was an issue in the South Dakota case of Sunshine Mutual Insurance Company v. Addy. In the Addy case, the insured owned a Dodge truck which he utilized for farm use and also an International truck which he utilized for a trucking business. On the way to transport two head of cattle and a hog from a nearby farm utilizing his Dodge truck, the insured was struck by another vehicle in an accident.

Coverage for liability insurance in the applicable policy was limited to situations in which the vehicle was utilized for a “farm use.” In examining the facts of the case, the Supreme Court of South Dakota held that the insured was not transporting the two head of cattle and hog from a nearby farm for a “farm use” but rather was engaged in the business as a commercial trucker, which was not covered under the policy. As the Supreme Court of South Dakota concluded, the truck was not “put to a farm use as contemplated by the policy even though the articles being transported are products of the farm.” Thus, no liability coverage was available for the insured.

23 Id. at 634-635.
24 Id. at 635.
25 Id. at 635-636.
26 Id. at 637.
27 Id.
28 Id.
In Texas Farm Bureau Mutual Insurance Company v. Carnes, the insured sought recovery for a fire loss of a cotton picking machine which was damaged in a fire in Texas.\(^{29}\) An endorsement in the policy modified coverage to include coverage for the cotton picking machine for “custom farming within a radius of 50 miles from the principal place of garagement.”\(^{30}\) The actual fire loss of the cotton picker occurred approximately 150 miles from garagement.\(^{31}\)

The insurer in the case contended that it had no duty to pay the insured on the claim due to the breach of the endorsement terms since the breach of the endorsement materially affected the risk.\(^{32}\) In response, the insured argued that since the breach of the endorsement did not directly contribute to the fire loss, then the breach of the endorsement should not be asserted as a defense to indemnity under the policy.\(^{33}\)

In ruling for the insured, the Texas Court of Civil Appeals closely examined the provisions of the fire insurance policy and noted that the policy did not contain any provision which only made the policy effective if the endorsement was complied with.\(^{34}\) In addition, the Court noted the policy did not include any statement which indicated that noncompliance with the endorsement would result in a void policy.\(^{35}\) The Court held that since the use of the cotton

\(^{30}\) Id. at 864.

\(^{31}\) Id.

\(^{32}\) Id.

\(^{33}\) Id. at 865.

\(^{34}\) Id. at 868.

\(^{35}\) Id.
picker at the time of the loss did not contribute to the fire, the policy must be resolved in favor of coverage.\textsuperscript{36}

In contrast to the holding with the \textit{Addy} case where the South Dakota Supreme Court found that the transporting of two head of cattle and a hog was not a “farm use” under a motor vehicle liability policy, the Missouri Court of Appeals held in \textit{Farm Bureau Town and Country Insurance Company of Missouri v Franklin} that the hauling of a load of “smashed cars” and “junk farm equipment” in order to clear land so the pasture could be used for livestock was a “farm use” under a motor vehicle liability policy.\textsuperscript{37} In the \textit{Franklin} case, the insured was involved in an accident on a trip where he hauled smashed cars and junk farm equipment on the way to visit with a company that purchased scrap metal.\textsuperscript{38}

The insurance policy at issue in the \textit{Franklin} case included an endorsement which stated that the insured vehicle must be utilized exclusively for “farm use” and that “any custom farming done by the insured or others, except in the occasional hauling of farm products for neighbors, voids the policy.”\textsuperscript{39} The insured contended he was engaged in a farming operation at the time of the hauling of the cars and equipment, and the insurer argued the insured was engaged in a “salvage business” and thus not a farm use under the policy.\textsuperscript{40}

In its determination of whether the hauling of cars and equipment constituted a “farm use” under the policy, the Missouri Court of Appeals closely examined the testimony of the

\textsuperscript{36} Id.

\textsuperscript{38} Id.

\textsuperscript{39} Id.

\textsuperscript{40} Id. at 365.
insured and a representative of the insurer. The insured testified he had previously hauled wood four or five times in the previous several months prior to the accident to clear the tract for pasture. In addition, the insured testified he had been clearing the tract of timber for several years and that he planned to use the proceeds of the trip in which the accident occurred to buy grass to sow for pasture.

The Court noted that the insurer’s representative, its director of underwriting, testified that clearing land for farming would be a “farm use” under the policy. In addition, the director also admitted that if a farmer had an “old junk tractor” on his farm and the farmer hauled it away on a motor vehicle, then such activity would be “farm use.” Despite these admissions, the insurer contended that the insured’s activities were not minimal in nature and constituted the running of a salvage business. In upholding the trial court’s finding that the insured’s activities constituted a “farm use” as contemplated by the insurance policy, the Missouri Court of Appeals stated that the “clearing land of junk so it could be used as pasture for livestock can reasonably be said to be a natural and necessary incident or consequence of a farming operation, even though perhaps not a foreseen or expected consequence of such operation.”

41 Id. at 362-364.
42 Id. at 362.
43 Id. at 362-363.
44 Id. at 363.
45 Id.
46 Id. at 365.
47 Id. at 367.
III. Custom Farming and the Duty to Procure Insurance

Issues related to custom farming and insurance coverage have also appeared in a case involving an insurance producer’s duty to procure insurance coverage. It is a general duty of an insurance producer to make at least “a good faith effort to procure the desired insurance and promptly inform the customer if this is not possible.” The failure to fulfill the duty to procure insurance coverage that the producer has agreed to provide results in liability to the producer. However, the insured also has a duty to unequivocally inform the producer of the specific coverage and policy terms he/she requests.

In Manzer v. Pantico, an insured allegedly sprayed a client’s farm in Nebraska with 2-4-D in an improper manner while conducting custom farming operations, causing approximately $10,000 in damages. The insurer denied insurance coverage on the claim on the basis the policy did not cover custom farming operations. Following the claim denial, the insured filed suit against its insurance producer on the theory of a breach of the duty to procure insurance for insured’s custom farming operations.

---

48 See BUSINESS LAW FOR INSURANCE PROFESSIONALS 8.17 (Donna Popow ed., 2012).

49 See Douglas R. Richmond, Insurance Agent and Broker Liability, 40 TORT TRIAL & INS. PRAC. L.J. 1, 16 (2004) (“An intermediary may be liable to the insured if he fails to procure insurance, or if the coverage he does procure is materially deficient in some way. If an intermediary is unable to procure the insurance he has agreed to provide, he has a further duty to inform his client timely of this so the client may look elsewhere or take other steps to protect its interests. These duties do not arise, however, merely because an agent or broker and an insured discuss coverage options or otherwise strike up a relationship. An intermediary is not obligated to assume a duty to procure insurance for a customer. Rather, the intermediary’s duty depends on a specific, unequivocal request by the insured to procure coverage”).

50 Id.

52 Id.

53 Id. at 812-813.
During the trial court proceedings, the insured admitted he did not remember ever specifically requesting the producer to obtain insurance coverage for custom farming operations, nor did the insured directly notify the producer he engaged in custom farming operations.\textsuperscript{54} The trial court granted the defendant’s motion for summary judgment and dismissed the plaintiff’s petition.\textsuperscript{55}

The insured argued in its appeal that a fact issue existed as to whether the insurance producer had actual knowledge of the insured’s custom farming operations.\textsuperscript{56} The insured noted one past conversation in which he told the insurance producer about fertilizing a crop on the wrong land.\textsuperscript{57} The Nebraska Supreme Court noted that irrespective of the nature of the conversation, it was not material to the issue of whether the plaintiff requested insurance coverage for custom farming specifically.\textsuperscript{58} While an insurer has a duty to procure insurance coverage for an insured, the insured also has a duty to inform the insurance producer of the coverage requested. A prior case in Nebraska, \textit{Kenyon v. Larsen}, established that the insured has a duty to advise an insurance producer of the requested insurance coverage.\textsuperscript{59} Since the insured did not produce evidence that it affirmatively requested insurance coverage from the producer for custom farming for its operations, its claim for a breach of duty to procure insurance failed.\textsuperscript{60}

\textsuperscript{54} \textit{Id.} at 813.

\textsuperscript{55} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{56} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{57} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{58} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{59} See \textit{Kenyon v. Larsen}, 286 N.W.2d 759, 764 (Neb. 1980).

\textsuperscript{60} See \textit{Manzer v. Pantico}, 307 N.W.2d at 813.
The Manzer case illustrates the significance that farmers who engage in custom farming must affirmatively request specific coverage for custom farming in order to receive proper insurance coverage for custom farming. Without such affirmative requests, a farmer cannot rely that adequate insurance coverage will be in place for custom farming even in the event the insurance producer has knowledge of custom farming operations.

IV. Custom Farming Exclusions and Endorsements in Insurance Policies

A question that has arisen in a number of cases is whether or not a particular insured is engaged in custom farming activities, and whether an insured engaged in custom farming activities is covered under a liability policy. In United Fire & Casualty Company v. Mras, the Supreme Court of Iowa addressed a situation in which an insured under a farm liability policy collided with an automobile while driving a tractor with a hay baler and moving from one custom hay baling site to another.\textsuperscript{61} The policy included an exclusion for personal injuries and property damage incurred while the insured engaged in custom farming.\textsuperscript{62}

The Supreme Court of Iowa held the exclusion did not apply since the exclusion was an “activity clause,” a clause which would apply to the activity engaged in at the very moment of the accident.\textsuperscript{63} Since the insured was not engaged in custom farming at the very moment of the accident, the exclusion did not apply.\textsuperscript{64}

\textsuperscript{61} See United Fire & Cas. Co. v. Mras, 55 N.W.2d 180, 181 (Iowa 1952).

\textsuperscript{62} Id.

\textsuperscript{63} Id. at 182.

\textsuperscript{64} Id. at 183.
The question of whether horse training is “custom farming” was faced by the Minnesota Court of Appeals in Harrison v. Donovan. In the Harrison case, a horse trainer allegedly permitted a horse to escape and the horse suffered injuries. The horse trainer submitted the claim to his insurer, which made the determination no coverage existed due to a policy exclusion for property damage arising out of custom farming.

In agreeing with the insurer that the policy unambiguously excluded coverage in the case, the Minnesota Court of Appeals examined the definition of “custom farming” in the policy, which stated: “Custom farming” means the use of any farm machinery, farm implement or draft animal in connection with farm operations for hire; or the care or raising of livestock or poultry for hire.” The Court found that the horse was within the meaning of “livestock” since it was raised for home use or profit, and that it was still livestock when it was in the care of the horse trainer. Thus, no coverage under the policy was afforded to the insured since the insured’s “care of the horse was the care of livestock for hire.”

One year after the Harrison v. Donovan case, in 1998 the Supreme Court of North Dakota faced the question of whether the employee of an insured’s custom-farming business was covered by a farm and ranch insurance policy. In Rebel v. Nodak Mutual Insurance Company, an employee of a custom farming business suffered a serious injury in a grain drill auger accident.

---

66 Id. at *1.

67 Id. at *2.

68 Id.

69 Id.

70 Id. at *3.

while engaged in custom seeding work. The custom farming business’ farm and ranch insurance policy included a policy exclusion excluding coverage for “bodily injury or property damage sustained by any farm employee arising out of custom farming operations.” The insurer refused to defend and indemnify its insured, contending the policy did not provide coverage for the employee’s claims. Both the insured’s employee and insured entered into a Miller-Shugart agreement where both parties stipulated to a settlement of all claims and that any claims would be paid from insurance proceeds. The trial court ruled in a declaratory judgment action that the policy did not provide coverage for the employee’s injuries.

The employee of the insured appealed the granting of summary judgment to the insurer.
However, the insured which operated the custom-farming business did not appeal.

On appeal, the Supreme Court of North Dakota held that the insured did not have standing. The procedural fact which proved fatal to the employee’s claim was that the custom

72 Id. at 812.
73 Id.
74 Id.
77 Id. at 813.
78 Id.
79 Id.
80 Id. at 814.
farming business did not properly assign its rights against the insurer to the employee.\textsuperscript{81} Thus, the Supreme Court of North Dakota dismissed the employee’s appeal.\textsuperscript{82}

Assuming arguendo a standing issue did not exist in the \textit{Rebel} case, it is unlikely the employee of the insured’s custom-farming business would have recovered had the appeal progressed. The applicable insurance policy of the insured contained an exclusion for custom farming, and the facts indicated the insured did not pay an additional premium for custom-farming coverage.\textsuperscript{83} Absent an ambiguity in the policy, it is very likely the Court would have found the insurer did not have a duty to defend and indemnify the custom-farming business.

However, the finding of an ambiguity relating to exclusions in a liability insurance policy will often result in a situation where coverage would be afforded to an insured.\textsuperscript{84} The Georgia Court of Appeals found an ambiguity existed in the 2001 case of \textit{Georgia Farm Bureau Mutual Insurance Company v. Meyers} with reading a custom farming endorsement and medical pay endorsement together in a liability insurance policy.\textsuperscript{85}

In the \textit{Meyers} case, a non-resident employee of a cattle company suffered an injury when struck by a wooden pole while in the scope and course of employment.\textsuperscript{86} The applicable insurance policy contained an exclusion for bodily injuries sustained by nonresident employees

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
    \item[\textsuperscript{81}] Id. at 813.
    \item[\textsuperscript{82}] Id. at 815.
    \item[\textsuperscript{83}] Id. at 812.
    \item[\textsuperscript{84}] See David F. Tavella, \textit{Are Insurance Policies Still Contracts?}, 42 CREIGHTON L. REV. 157 (2009) (“While courts consider insurance policies contracts of adhesion, and construe any ambiguity strictly against the drafter, courts have always considered an insurance policy a contract”); see also Michael B. Rappaport, \textit{The Ambiguity Rule and Insurance Law: Why Insurance Contracts Should Not be Construed Against the drafter}, 30 GA. L. REV. 171 (1995) (generally discussing the ambiguity rule with insurance contracts).
    \item[\textsuperscript{86}] Id.
\end{itemize} \end{footnotesize}
of the insured. However, the same policy included a “Custom Farming Liability Coverage” endorsement which provided coverage for bodily injury claims for custom farming relating to “the operation, maintenance, use, loading or unloading of farm tractors, trailers, implements, draft animals or vehicles you use while under contract.” In addition to the custom farming endorsement, the policy included a second endorsement for medical payment insurance, but contained an exclusion for bodily injuries sustained by farm employees.

The trial court ruled that reading the two provisions together created an ambiguity in the policy, denying the insurer’s motion for summary judgment. On appeal, the Georgia Court of Appeals noted that the insured as well as its employees would have been aware of the particular risks associated with the insured’s farm location in contrast with the risks associated with various custom farming locations. Therefore, the Court of Appeals found it would be reasonable for an insured to not have coverage for bodily injuries sustained at the insured’s location but have coverage at custom farming locations for employee bodily injuries “because of the different risks of injury from negligence over which the insured and the employee have less control and familiarity.”

Applying the reasonable expectations doctrine, the Court indicated that a reasonable person considering the insured’s position would reasonably conclude the insured intended

87 Id.
88 Id. at 322-323.
89 Id. at 323.
90 Id.
91 Id.
92 Id.
93 For additional commentary concerning the reasonable expectations doctrine in insurance law, please see: Arthur J. Park, What to Reasonably Expect in the Coming Years from the Reasonable Expectations of the Insured Doctrine, coverage to apply for bodily injuries sustained by employees at custom farming locations but not the insured’s primary farm location. Therefore, the Court found that the trial court did not commit any error in providing coverage.

In Banner v. Raisin Valley Inc., a farmer insured was involved in an automobile accident in Ohio while driving a semi-tractor after hauling seed corn for a neighboring farmer. The accident resulted in two fatalities and several other injuries. At the time of the accident, the farmer insured was covered under a farmowner’s insurance policy as well as a personal umbrella liability policy.

The plaintiffs in the underlying case contended both the farmowner’s insurance policy as well as the personal umbrella liability policy provided coverage for the accident. The trial court granted summary judgment on behalf of the insurer, holding that neither policy provided coverage to the plaintiffs.

The applicable farmowner’s policy provided coverage for custom farming activities. The insurance policy defined custom farming as “farming operations involving the production or

---

95 Id. at 324.

96 See Banner v. Raisin Valley, Inc., 33 Fed. Appx. 767, 768 (6th Cir. 2002).

97 Id.

98 Id.

99 Id.

100 Id.

101 Id. at 769.
havesting of crops for others away from the insured location for remuneration.” On appeal, the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit examined the precise language of the definition, noting that the insured was not engaged in the “production” or “harvesting” of crops when he hauled seed corn from one location to another. Thus, the Court held that the farmowner’s policy did not provide coverage.

Despite the Court’s holding on the farmowner’s policy, it also closely examined the personal umbrella liability policy. The insurer contended that since a corporate entity paid the premiums on the umbrella policy, the umbrella policy was in excess of primary insurance that the insured pays for himself. However, the Court also noted that the insured could have reasonably believed the umbrella policy covered personal liability in excess of the underlying primary policy. Therefore, the Court held that the personal umbrella liability policy was ambiguous and thus coverage was provided for the farmer insured through the personal umbrella liability policy.

Finally, in Trujillo v. North Carolina Grange Mutual Insurance Company, the Court of Appeals of North Carolina found no coverage for two individuals injured (one deceased, one injured) by the operator of a cotton picker. The applicable insurance policy included a custom

\begin{footnotes}
102 Id.
103 Id.
104 Id. at 770.
105 Id. at 773.
106 Id.
107 Id.
108 Id. at 774.
\end{footnotes}
farming endorsement extended liability coverage for “farm tractors, trailers, implements …, or vehicles used while under contract to others for a charge in connection with any farming operation.” However, the Court noted there was no evidence that the cotton picker was utilized under a contract for a charge at the time of the accident. Since the custom farming endorsement did not apply, the operator of the cotton picker was not an “insured” under the insurer’s policy and thus there was no coverage under the policy.

All of the above cases indicate insurance policies vary widely relating to whether liability coverage will exist in a situation where an insured engages in custom farming. An issue which is becoming more commonly litigated throughout the country arises with liability coverage for the loss of livestock in a custom situation.

V. Custom Farming, Livestock Losses and Insurance Coverage

A majority of courts have held that farm insurance policies do not provide coverage in situations where a livestock loss is suffered while in the care of a custom farmer. In Grinnell Mutual Reinsurance Company v. Laforge, the Illinois Court of Appeals heard an insurance coverage case involving a custom farmer who had several hundred hogs in his care when an electrical company turned off the power due to an alleged failure of the custom farmer to pay a power bill. Approximately 700 pigs died.

110 Id. at 593.

111 Id. at 593-594.

112 Id. at 594.

114 Id.
The insurer’s initial letter to the insured custom farmer noted that its investigation of the loss was completed and that the farm policy did not furnish coverage for the loss.\textsuperscript{115} In a subsequent letter approximately one month later, the insurer once again asserted the farm policy did not furnish coverage and also noted a custom farming exclusion applied.\textsuperscript{116}

On appeal, the insured custom farmer argued the mend the hold doctrine applied to bar the insurer from asserting the custom farming exclusion.\textsuperscript{117} The mend the hold doctrine,\textsuperscript{118} addressed in a number of jurisdictions,\textsuperscript{119} bars an insurer from denying a claim for one purported reason and then denying it for another in the midst of litigation.\textsuperscript{120}

In examining the mend the hold issue, the LaForge court remarked that the original letter from the insurer to the insured contained a reservation of the right to assert additional bases for denying coverage later on.\textsuperscript{121} In addition, the LaForge court also noted the timing issue – the insurer asserted the custom farming exclusion prior to the filing of a declaratory judgment.

\textsuperscript{115} Id.

\textsuperscript{116} Id. at 1134-1135.

\textsuperscript{117} Id. at 1140.

\textsuperscript{119} For example, see Dahlmann v. Geico Gen. Ins. Co., Docket No’s. 324698, 325225, 2016 WL 1125976, *8 (Mich. Ct. App. March 22, 2016) (“It appears that – under Michigan practice – this doctrine is equitable in nature and applies when it would be unfair to allow an insurer to assert an additional ground for denial after inducing the insured to rely on a different ground for denial to the insured’s detriment.”); Health Corp. v. Clarendon Nat. Ins. Co., C.A. No. 07C-09-102 RRC, 2009 WL 2215126, *14 (Del. Sup. Ct. July 15, 2009) (“The “mend the hold” doctrine “bars a party who rejects a contract on certain specified grounds from changing position after litigation is filed when those grounds for rejection do not pan out.” Thus, the “mend-the-hold” doctrine is an equitable doctrine intended to prevent a party from asserting grounds for repudiating contractual obligations and then, in bad faith, asserting different grounds for repudiation once litigation has commenced and it becomes apparent the original grounds for repudiation will not work.”); & Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. v. Am. Home Assurance Co., Inc., 858 N.E.2d 530, 539 (Ill. Ct. App. 4th Dist. 2006).

\textsuperscript{120} See Grinnell Mut. Reinsurance Co. v. LaForge, 863 N.E.2d at 1140.

\textsuperscript{121} Id. at 1140-1141.
complaint concerning coverage, thus the mend the hold doctrine did not apply since the doctrine applies only in situations of an inconsistency during litigation.\textsuperscript{122} Finally, the LaForge court also stated that the doctrine does not apply in the absence of a showing of detriment, unfair surprise, or arbitrariness.\textsuperscript{123} No facts of unfair surprise or arbitrariness were present since the insurer filed the declaratory judgment complaint nine months after giving notice to its insured concerning the custom farming exclusion.\textsuperscript{124}

Coverage for livestock losses in a custom farming situation may also be barred by the “business pursuits” exclusion of an insurance policy. A number of insurance policies contain “business pursuits” exclusions which deny liability coverage arising out of the “business pursuits” of the insured.\textsuperscript{125} In McNeilus Hog Farms v. Farm Bureau Mutual Insurance Company, the custom farmer insured entered into a contract feeding agreement for hogs.\textsuperscript{126} A loss of 808 hogs was suffered when the ventilation system of the insured’s hog confinement building failed to activate while pumping manure from the building.\textsuperscript{127} The insurer declined to provide coverage to the custom farmer for the underlying claim for the loss of the hogs, asserting the “business pursuits” exclusion of the policy applied.\textsuperscript{128} The Iowa Court of Appeals noted that while the policy excepted custom farming activities from the “business” definition when custom farming...

\textsuperscript{122} Id. at 1141.

\textsuperscript{123} Id.

\textsuperscript{124} Id.

\textsuperscript{125} For more information regarding the “business pursuits” exclusion in liability insurance policies, see John D. Copeland, The Farmer’s Comprehensive Liability Policy: The Business Pursuits Exclusion, 26-APR ARK. LAW. 44 (1992).

\textsuperscript{127} Id.

\textsuperscript{128} Id.
activities do not exceed $3,000 in a year, by the language of the exception the policy would imply that any custom farming activities above $3,000 in a year would be defined as a “business” activity.\textsuperscript{129} Therefore, the “business pursuits” exclusion applied.\textsuperscript{130}

Finally, courts have also tended to uphold the exclusion for property damage in the “care, custody, or control” of the insured in situations involving livestock losses. For example, in \textit{Gaza Beef, Inc. v. Grinnell Mutual Reinsurance Company}, the insured faced a claim for the negligent feeding of cattle in a feeding cattle operation.\textsuperscript{131} The policy also contained a “custom feeding endorsement,” and the insured contended the endorsement conflicted with other provisions of the policy.\textsuperscript{132} The Minnesota Court of Appeals upheld the “care, custody, or control” exclusion, thus it applied to exclude coverage of the cattle loss.\textsuperscript{133} In its decision, the \textit{Gaza Beef} court remarked the purpose of the “care, custody, or control” exclusion is to prevent general liability insurance coverage from being transformed into a form of property insurance coverage.\textsuperscript{134} In addition, the \textit{Gaza Beef} court stated that the purpose of a “custom-feeding endorsement” is to provide liability coverage for situations such as personal injuries which take place on the custom feeding premises, and if an insured wished to obtain coverage for the loss of property under the insured’s care or control, the insured should purchase a first-party property insurance policy.\textsuperscript{135}

\textsuperscript{129} Id.

\textsuperscript{130} Id.

\textsuperscript{132} Id. at *4.

\textsuperscript{133} Id.

\textsuperscript{134} Id.

\textsuperscript{135} Id. at *5.
Other courts have come to similar conclusions regarding the applicability of the “care, custody, or control” exclusion to livestock losses that take place while the livestock are in the care of an insured. The United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit also held in Grinnell Mutual Reinsurance Company v. Schwieger a “custom feeding” endorsement did not provide coverage where a “care, custody, or control” exclusion applied.\(^\text{136}\) The Iowa Supreme Court also issued a similar holding in Boelman v. Grinnell Mutual Reinsurance Company.\(^\text{137}\) The Boelman court remarked that even in other contexts, such as commercial general liability policies, an endorsement removing a pollution damage exclusion would not provide coverage and trump a “care, custody, or control” exclusion for property damage.\(^\text{138}\)

The Boelman court also closely examined the insureds’ reasonable expectations argument.\(^\text{139}\) Interestingly, the Boelman court stated that the insureds did not conduct the requisite discovery indicating that their reasonable expectations with the custom feeding endorsement would be to provide coverage for the hogs while they were in their care, custody or control.\(^\text{140}\) The Boelman court specifically remarked the insureds’ did not file an affidavit concerning their reasonable expectations of coverage.\(^\text{141}\) However, the Boelman court also noted that the policy itself did not contain any ambiguous language, despite the presence of both a custom feeding endorsement and a “care, custody or control” exclusion.\(^\text{142}\)

\(^{136}\) See Grinnell Mut. Reinsurance Co. v. Schwieger, 685 F.3d 697, 703 (8th Cir. 2012).

\(^{137}\) See Boelman v. Grinnell Mut. Reinsurance Co., 826 N.W.2d 494, 504 (Iowa 2013).

\(^{138}\) Id.; see also Kemper Nat’l Ins. Co.’s v. Heaven Hill Distilleries, Inc., 82 S.W.3d 869, 875 (Ky. 2002).

\(^{139}\) See Boelman v. Grinnell Mut. Reinsurance Co., 826 N.W.2d at 505-506.

\(^{140}\) Id. at 506.

\(^{141}\) Id.

\(^{142}\) Id.
The Gaza Beef, Schwieger and Boelman decisions all indicate that courts in the future are unlikely to find coverage through a custom feeding endorsement for livestock losses suffered while in the care, custody or control of a custom farmer. In addition, the Boelman case indicates that reasonable expectations arguments may not apply, even if the insured were to proffer evidence through affidavits concerning an insured’s reasonable expectations. These decisions all indicate that a custom farmer may not have adequate coverage for a livestock loss if they do not have a separate property insurance policy covering property loss.

VI. Conclusion

As all the cases discussed above indicate, there are a variety of legal issues which have arisen with regard to custom farming and insurance. With custom farming gaining more popularity, especially among younger farmers,143 the insurance coverages and limitations associated with custom farming need to be recognized by all farmers and those with vested interests in agricultural insurance.

143 See Thiesse, supra note 17.