The Contract: Newt's Mandate?

David R Mayhew

Available at: https://works.bepress.com/david-mayhew/378/
The Contract: Newt’s Mandate?

Yale Professor David Mayhew on What Place History Will Accord the 1994 Elections

By David R. Mayhew

President Truman speaks in the legendary "do-nothing 80th Congress." But, notes Yale professor David Mayhew, that was really Democratic propaganda. Even so, the Congress of 1947 and 1948 is the precedent that has sustained this year's new GOP majority.

In the history of the nation's political parties, there is no clearer example of a "mandate" than the election of 1946. The Republican Party swept to power in Congress, and that majority was confirmed in the 1948 election. The result was a period of bipartisanship in Congress, with the Republicans leading the way.

President Truman speaks in the legendary "do-nothing 80th Congress." But, notes Yale professor David Mayhew, that was really Democratic propaganda. Even so, the Congress of 1947 and 1948 is the precedent that has sustained this year's new GOP majority.

In the history of the nation's political parties, there is no clearer example of a "mandate" than the election of 1946. The Republican Party swept to power in Congress, and that majority was confirmed in the 1948 election. The result was a period of bipartisanship in Congress, with the Republicans leading the way.

President Truman speaks in the legendary "do-nothing 80th Congress." But, notes Yale professor David Mayhew, that was really Democratic propaganda. Even so, the Congress of 1947 and 1948 is the precedent that has sustained this year's new GOP majority.

In the history of the nation's political parties, there is no clearer example of a "mandate" than the election of 1946. The Republican Party swept to power in Congress, and that majority was confirmed in the 1948 election. The result was a period of bipartisanship in Congress, with the Republicans leading the way.

President Truman speaks in the legendary "do-nothing 80th Congress." But, notes Yale professor David Mayhew, that was really Democratic propaganda. Even so, the Congress of 1947 and 1948 is the precedent that has sustained this year's new GOP majority.

In the history of the nation's political parties, there is no clearer example of a "mandate" than the election of 1946. The Republican Party swept to power in Congress, and that majority was confirmed in the 1948 election. The result was a period of bipartisanship in Congress, with the Republicans leading the way.

President Truman speaks in the legendary "do-nothing 80th Congress." But, notes Yale professor David Mayhew, that was really Democratic propaganda. Even so, the Congress of 1947 and 1948 is the precedent that has sustained this year's new GOP majority.

In the history of the nation's political parties, there is no clearer example of a "mandate" than the election of 1946. The Republican Party swept to power in Congress, and that majority was confirmed in the 1948 election. The result was a period of bipartisanship in Congress, with the Republicans leading the way.

President Truman speaks in the legendary "do-nothing 80th Congress." But, notes Yale professor David Mayhew, that was really Democratic propaganda. Even so, the Congress of 1947 and 1948 is the precedent that has sustained this year's new GOP majority.

In the history of the nation's political parties, there is no clearer example of a "mandate" than the election of 1946. The Republican Party swept to power in Congress, and that majority was confirmed in the 1948 election. The result was a period of bipartisanship in Congress, with the Republicans leading the way.

President Truman speaks in the legendary "do-nothing 80th Congress." But, notes Yale professor David Mayhew, that was really Democratic propaganda. Even so, the Congress of 1947 and 1948 is the precedent that has sustained this year's new GOP majority.

In the history of the nation's political parties, there is no clearer example of a "mandate" than the election of 1946. The Republican Party swept to power in Congress, and that majority was confirmed in the 1948 election. The result was a period of bipartisanship in Congress, with the Republicans leading the way.

President Truman speaks in the legendary "do-nothing 80th Congress." But, notes Yale professor David Mayhew, that was really Democratic propaganda. Even so, the Congress of 1947 and 1948 is the precedent that has sustained this year's new GOP majority.

In the history of the nation's political parties, there is no clearer example of a "mandate" than the election of 1946. The Republican Party swept to power in Congress, and that majority was confirmed in the 1948 election. The result was a period of bipartisanship in Congress, with the Republicans leading the way.