Keeping Men Men and Women Down:
Sex Segregation, Anti-Essentialism, and Masculinity

by David S. Cohen¹

Sex segregation is everywhere. In An Introduction to the Stubborn Persistence of Sex Segregation,² I introduced the variety of ways that sex segregation³ currently exists in American law and society. Despite the first statutory protections against sex discrimination in American law appearing almost five decades ago and the revolution with respect to sex discrimination in constitutional law occurring almost four decades ago, sex segregation is alive and well. It persists in mandatory, administrative, permissive, and voluntary forms in almost every walk of life: employment, education, criminal justice, military, restrooms, social organizations, athletics, religion, and more. In the introductory article, I described different theoretical approaches to understanding the way that law should address sex segregation but did not develop my own position on which of those approaches is best.

Here, I begin that endeavor by adopting an anti-essentialist framework to investigate sex segregation and what it means for masculinity. Sex segregation in all the forms I have described affects people in complex ways and in many different contexts. Women are often excluded from particular activities and subject to stereotypes about their interests and abilities; however, at the same time, women frequently take advantage of sex segregation as a way to fight against past discrimination, showcase their own talents without competition from men, or to escape from patriarchy and the violence and discrimination associated with it. Transgendered and inter-sexed individuals have different issues with sex segregation as they have difficulty figuring out where they fit into a social and legal system with pervasive sex segregation. People of color face different issues with sex segregation as well, as there is a long history connecting sex segregation to race segregation. Moreover, sex segregation raises issues of stereotyping based on the intersection of race and sex.

³ Throughout this project, I am using a very strict and particular definition of sex segregation. I set forth the definition in detail in id. at ???. To summarize for readers of this article, by using the word “sex,” I am referring to segregation that occurs based on a person’s status as a man or a woman. “Sex” is a term that refers to biology or reproductive anatomy, not to characteristics, personality, or traits commonly associated with people who share particular reproductive anatomy. Thus, “sex” is in contrast to “gender,” as is clear when thinking about particular forms of segregation. For instance, people are not required to register for the military draft based on whether they exhibit masculine or feminine characteristics (their “gender”) but rather based on their reproductive anatomy, their biology (their “sex”). Put another way, masculine women are not required to register for the draft; however, effeminate men are. By “segregation,” I am referring to complete separation or exclusion by rule. I am not merely referring to a classification in which people are treated differently based on sex. Moreover, I am not referring to de facto segregation, in which there is no rule that requires separation or exclusion but complete separation or exclusion may result. Finally, the separation or exclusion must be complete, without one exception.

These are all important issues that I intend to study in the future, as well as ultimately reaching a conclusion about when and where, if at all, sex segregation should be allowed or required in this country. After all, there will be points in reading this article where the reader will intuitively desire an acknowledgment of the reasons in favor of sex segregation and an explanation of how the world could possibly work without it. However, that is not the point of this article. Here, in this first piece analyzing the material I set forth in the introduction to this project, I want to focus on the effect the current regime of sex segregation has on masculinity.

The study of law and masculinity is a burgeoning field. It has been useful in critically evaluating important aspects of work,⁴ the presidency,⁵ the Constitution,⁶ education,⁷ crime,⁸ family,⁹ feminist theory,¹⁰ and other areas of law. Scholars, particularly feminist scholars, that have investigated the way law affects men and masculinity do so to challenge the notion that the male and the masculine are natural and fixed and should serve as the basis for understanding equality.¹¹ Without doing so, these scholars believe that the work of feminist legal theory can never be complete, as women and femininity might see changes, but the problems of men and masculinity would remain the same. Without investigating the way law affects and constructs men and masculinity, equality will be illusive.

Understanding sex segregation is a vital part of the study of law and masculinity. In fact, as I will argue in this article, current-day sex segregation is one of the central ways that law and society define and construct who is a man and what it means to be a man. When law or society tells people that a place or activity is reserved for men alone, or in the converse, that men are excluded from a particular place or activity, two important messages are sent: one, that there are distinct categories of people based on reproductive anatomy and that these anatomical distinctions are a legitimate way of organizing and sorting people; and two, that people with the reproductive anatomy labeled “male” are supposed to behave in a certain way. As I have argued in the past,¹² these messages produce distinct harms for women, who are often subordinated to men based on these differences and characteristics, as well as men, both men who conform and do not conform to the expected notions of masculine behavior.

In looking at sex segregation and masculinity, I focus in this article on two separate theoretical concepts – hegemonic masculinity and the hegemony of men. Ultimately, I argue here that the various forms of sex segregation still existing in the United States help create and perpetuate a particular form of dominant masculinity, what theorists call hegemonic masculinity. They also substantially contribute to the dominance of men over women and non-hegemonically masculine men, what other theorists call the hegemony of men. In both ways, sex segregation contributes to an essentialized view of what it means to be a man – both in the attributes associated with an idealized manhood and the power ascribed and available to men.

To make these arguments, this article will proceed in four parts. First, I will provide a brief summary of the various types of sex segregation that I detailed in depth in the article introducing this project. Understanding the scope and variety of sex segregation that currently exists in the United States is essential to being able to analyze how present-day sex segregation affects masculinity.

In the second part of this article, I set forth the general theoretical framework that I will use to analyze sex segregation and masculinity. Two concepts will be central: gender anti-essentialism and multiple masculinities. Anti-essentialism, as applied to sex and gender, is the notion that there is no essential package of characteristics that can be used to describe all men or all women. Anti-essentialism rejects the notion that men are or should be masculine and that women are or should be feminine. Applied to the study of masculinity, anti-essentialism leads to the notion that instead of one masculinity to which men must strive, there are instead multiple masculinities. Both of these concepts, anti-essentialism and multiple masculinities will drive the rest of the analysis in this article.

After providing this theoretical framework, in the third part of the article, I analyze how sex segregation contributes to a dominant form of masculinity known as hegemonic masculinity. Hegemonic masculinity is a concept that has been developed by masculinity scholars to explain the dominant ideal of masculinity that exists within a particular culture at a particular point in time. Sex segregation in all of its forms both contributes to and reinforces particular aspects of hegemonic masculinity. In this section, I describe three such characteristics that sex segregation connects with masculinity -- that men are not feminine, that men are heterosexual, and that men are aggressive. I argue that in doing so, sex segregation essentializes masculinity in a way that creates and reinforces a dominant view of what a man is supposed to be.

Finally, in the fourth part of the article, I argue that sex segregation not only helps to maintain hegemonic masculinity but also that it contributes to the hegemony of men. The hegemony of men refers to men's position as dominant in the gender hierarchy. By differentiating men and women and requiring compliance with that differentiation, sex segregation furthers men's access to socially-valuable knowledge and power as well as the maintenance of stereotyped and subordinating views about women and men who do not exhibit hegemonic masculinity. Sex segregation thus is an important part of keeping men “men” and keeping women subordinated.¹³

I. The Ways of Sex Segregation

In 1963, Congress passed the first federal civil rights law covering women, the Equal Pay Act, which required that men and women receive the same pay for the same job.¹⁴ Title VII’s prohibition on discrimination in employment based on, among other things, sex came a year later.¹⁵ The 1970s brought Title IX and its prohibition on discrimination based on sex in educational institutions that receive federal funding¹⁶ as well as an expansion of the Fair Housing Act of 1968 to include a prohibition on sex discrimination.¹⁷ The Supreme Court also took up the mantle of non-discrimination based on sex during the 70s, finally expanding the coverage of the Fourteenth Amendment’s Equal Protection Clause in 1976 to prohibit most forms of government discrimination based on sex.¹⁸ Thus, over the course of 13 years, women’s status under federal law drastically changed, and the elimination of some of the most severe forms of sex discrimination followed.¹⁹

Yet, here we are almost four decades later, and sex segregation is alive and well. In fact, it has persisted in ways that affect most people throughout their lives. In the first article in this project, I extensively detailed the various forms of sex segregation that continue to exist. Here, I will only briefly summarize these forms of sex segregation and the various areas of life that are segregated.²⁰ Doing so will set the stage for the analysis of sex segregation and masculinity that comes later in this article.

Sex segregation in this country exists in four different categories: mandatory, administrative, permissive, and voluntary. Mandatory sex segregation is sex segregation that is required by law. It can be required in either a public or private setting (or both). Administrative sex segregation is sex segregation that the government undertakes in its administrative capacity, though not required by law to do so. Permissive sex segregation occurs when law explicitly permits sex segregation in a particular context. Like mandatory sex segregation, permissive sex ¹³ Those looking for an answer to the ultimate question -- when and where, if at all, should law allow or require sex segregation in this country -- are not going to find it in this article. While that is the question this project will eventually address, this article is just the beginning of the analysis.

Boren*, 429 U.S. 190, 197 (1976) (“To withstand constitutional challenge, previous cases establish that classifications by gender must serve important governmental objectives and must be substantially related to achievement of those objectives.”). The Court first struck down a law that discriminated against women in Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71 (1971), and came one Justice away from analyzing classifications based on sex under the highest level of constitutional scrutiny in Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677 (1973). The standard the Court ultimately adopted in Craig has since been termed “intermediate scrutiny” because it is more forgiving of government classifications than the highest standard, strict scrutiny, but still more exacting than base-level rational basis review. See Clark v. Jeter, 486 U.S. 456, 461 (1988) (using, for the first time in Supreme Court case law, the term “intermediate scrutiny” to describe the level of scrutiny for classifications based on “sex or illegitimacy”).

segregation can occur in public or private settings. Finally, voluntary sex segregation is sex segregation undertaken by non-governmental institutions and organizations without explicit permission from the law to do so.

Each of these types of sex segregation occurs in a wide variety of contexts within American life. Mandatory sex segregation has one of its most visible examples in the context of the military. By Department of Defense policy, women are excluded from “assignments to units below the brigade level whose primary mission is direct ground combat.” Under federal law, only men are required to register for the draft, and only men are subject to the penalties that come from failing to do so. On the state level, eighteen states and the District of Columbia have provisions in their statutes or constitution (or both) that state that the state militia shall consist of all “able-bodied male citizens.”

Of course, mandatory sex segregation occurs in contexts outside the military as well. Within the criminal justice system, prison and jail populations are frequently required by law to be segregated based on sex. Also, state laws also sometimes require transportation, searches, and employment within prisons, jails, and criminal court to be segregated based on sex. Restrooms, locker rooms, showers, and the like are another area of mandatory sex segregation with which people come into contact on a regular basis. Various state laws segregate restrooms based on the restroom’s location, based on the presence of men and women in a particular location, and based on the presence of women alone in a particular location. Many states also have laws that segregate based on sex in the medical context, either in segregating those who receive treatment or requiring those who provide treatment to be of the same sex as the patient. Other contexts with mandatory sex segregation in state law include outdoor youth programs, elections, drug and alcohol testing in the private sector, honors, housing, identification card photography, jury sequestration, massage parlors, nudism, schools, and sexual violence programs.

Administrative sex segregation occurs when government-run institutions are not required to sex segregate by law but nonetheless do so in their operating capacity. For instance, government buildings of all types, whether open to the public or not, are likely to have sex segregated bathrooms and, if within the building’s purpose, sex-segregated locker rooms, dressing rooms, or showers, whether for employees or the public. Correctional facilities also administratively sex segregate, as most separate men and women despite not having a state statute requiring them to do so. Public schools, from elementary and secondary to undergraduate and graduate institutions, also segregate based on sex in bathrooms and locker rooms as well as living arrangements, such as dorms and dorm rooms or fraternity or sorority houses.

Permissive sex segregation is sex segregation that occurs with the explicit permission of the law. Two federal laws and their state analogs provide the opportunity to segregate in employment and education. Title VII prohibits employment discrimination based on sex²¹ but permits employers to sex segregate positions if there “is a bona fide occupational qualification reasonably necessary to the normal operation of that particular business or enterprise.”²² Courts have approved BFOQs in strength-related jobs such as prison guards, privacy-related jobs such as spa, restroom, and health club attendants, and authenticity-related jobs such as acting. Title IX prohibits sex discrimination in federally funded educational institutions,²³ but the statute itself, as well as its implementing regulations, has several exceptions that make it clear when sex segregation in education is permitted. These exceptions permit, in particular contexts and with some limitations, single-sex schools and classes as well as sex-segregated athletics, housing, scholarships, extra-curricular activities, and restrooms.²⁴ Beyond Title VII and Title IX, state laws permit sex segregation in health clubs, athletic programs, housing, medical facilities, prisons, and more.

²² 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(e). Several states have BFOQ provisions in their own anti-discrimination laws. See, e.g., Ind. Code § 22-9-1-3.

Finally, there is the vast category of voluntary sex segregation, a category that broadly affects people's lives but is mostly outside the realm of the law or government. Private institutions and organizations voluntarily sex segregate in membership, participation, and distribution of honors. These organizations are as numerous as they are diffuse. They include national membership organizations such as the Fraternal Order of Eagles, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, and the Boy Scouts of America and the Girl Scouts of the USA. They also include more local organizations such as golf clubs, health clubs, and support groups. Sports competitions also sex segregate, from the international, such as Olympic teams, to the national, such as the Association of Tennis Professionals or the Women's National Basketball Association, to the local, such as recreational and youth leagues. Religious institutions also fall into this category in sex segregating who can ascend to respected positions, such as a priest, sex segregating worship, such as separating men and women in conservative strands of Judaism or Islam, or sex segregating religious schools and housing. A highly visible form of voluntary sex segregation also occurs in performing arts award ceremonies, such as the Academy Awards' best actor/actress category. Finally, there are endless examples of much more micro and informal forms of voluntary sex segregation from groups organized around a particular hobby, interest, or affiliation, such as a gathering of mothers or a men's knitting club, to informal social gatherings, such as a bachelor party or "girls night out."

Although this list does not paint a picture anywhere near as pervasive and subordinating as race segregation in this country's history or current sex segregation in some other countries, it does illustrate that sex segregation continues despite advances in sex discrimination law. And it continues in almost all walks of life, from requirements imposed by law to everyday choices made by individuals on how to organize their own affairs.

II. Gender, Anti-essentialism, and Masculinities

To critically evaluate the various forms of sex segregation laid out above and explore what they mean for men and masculinity, I argue in this section that two important theoretical frameworks are the most useful for this project: anti-essentialism and multiple masculinities. In fact, as I will discuss below, multiple masculinities is a concept that is really anti-essentialism theory applied to the study of masculinity. Both of these theories are valuable because they help understand masculinity as a socially constructed, yet powerfully influential, concept.

²⁴ See 20 U.S.C. §§ 1681-88; 34 C.F.R. §§ 106.1-71. Several states have their own state-version of Title IX with similar exceptions.

A. Gender and Anti-essentialism

There are countless theories of gender.²⁵ On one extreme is the generally-held notion that gender and sex are fixed notions that are inherently linked: men are, or should be, masculine, and women are, or should be, feminine.²⁶ Under this theory, both sex and gender consist of binaries. Your sex is biologically determined and is either man or woman. And, based on which sex you are, your gender is the set of behavioral and psychological characteristics associated with your sex. Thus, your biological sex pre-determines that you are or should be either masculine or feminine; if your gender does not match your sex, in other words if you are an effeminate male or a masculine female, you need to change how you behave.²⁷ Because man/masculinity and woman/femininity are inherently linked under this theory, the concepts of sex and gender are virtually indistinguishable. Discrimination against people based on their gender is identical to discrimination based on their sex because if an entity discriminates against masculinity (or femininity), it is by definition discriminating against men (or women).

At the other end of the spectrum of theories on gender lies the notion that sex and gender are fluid and have no fixed content. Most famously associated with Judith Butler, this theory argues that what we think of as gender is really performance.²⁸ In other words, there is no pre-existing set of characteristics that are masculine or feminine, and what we think of as masculinity or femininity are just the performances of those who we label as such. This theory is not just that men can be masculine or feminine or some mix of both (same with women). Rather, it goes further saying that there is no “masculine” or “feminine” that men or women can be. Instead, those are words that we use to describe the performances of men and women. Through performing gender, men and women create gender.²⁹ To Butler, gender also produces the perceived biologically-distinct sexes, which in reality are not naturally distinct categories but become so because of gender performance and labels.³⁰ Under this theory, “it makes little sense to speak of women [or men] as a social group; instead, the focus is on ‘discursive practices’ that give meaning to the idea of woman [or man]”³¹ And, once those performances create socially-identifiable meaning, people are constantly performing or doing gender at the risk of being assessed by others in accordance to the normative standards.³²

³⁰ Id. at 10 (“As a result, gender is not to culture as sex is to nature; gender is also the discursive/cultural means by which ‘sexed nature’ or ‘a natural sex’ is produced and established as ‘prediscursive,’ prior to culture, a politically neutral surface on which culture acts.”).

³¹ MARTHA CHAMALLAS, INTRODUCTION TO FEMINIST LEGAL THEORY 95 (2d ed. 2003).

³² Candace West & Don H. Zimmerman, Doing Gender, 1 GENDER & SOCIETY 125, 136-37 (1987) (“[T]o ‘do’ gender is not always to live up to normative conceptions of femininity or masculinity; it is to engage in behavior at the risk of gender assessment.”).

Somewhat less extreme is the theory that gender is the constructed social practice that operates on bodies based on their reproductive capacity. Raewyn Connell puts forth this theory as a way to ground gender in bodies and the way society addresses bodies. She defines gender as the “structure of social relations that centres on the reproductive arena, and the set of practices that bring reproductive distinctions between bodies into social processes.”³³ According to this theory, gender appears unchanging because of the societal structures that define and maintain reproductive difference, but in actuality are constantly in flux as societal structures develop and change. To look to how gender is created “involves a vast and complicated institutional and cultural order. It is this whole order that comes into relation with bodies, and gives them gender meanings.”³⁴ Connell’s theory shares the social constructivist nature of Butler’s, but insists that bodies and their reproductive capacity are central to thinking about gender.

Anti-essentialism is a broad umbrella term that I use in this article to describe these latter two theories about gender, which I believe are the most useful for analyzing sex segregation generally, and its effects on men and masculinity more specifically. Anti-essentialism relies on the observation that within the societally-determined categories “men” and “women,” there is more variation than exists between the two societally-determined categories.³⁵ Anti-essentialist theory argues that the ordinary binary sex and gender categories fail to take account of this complexity and the multiplicity of human identity and difference. In fact, it is the existence and imposition of sex and gender categories that work to construct identity and difference, rather than merely to reflect difference.

In this sense, anti-essentialism is a key component of post-modern³⁶ and post-structuralist³⁷ feminist legal theories, closely related theories that recognize the socially-constructed nature of identity and difference. Applied to legal theory, anti-essentialism thus challenges the structures in law and society that create and reinforce identity and difference with respect to sex and gender.³⁸ By confining people to those categories, societal institutions and discourses work to constrain identity and limit freedom. The value of anti-essentialism understood in this way is that it challenges us not to accept the structures in law and society that ordinarily seem natural. In this way, anti-essentialism is a valuable tool in evaluating sex segregation, as the sex segregation that has survived the feminist legal reforms in the past several decades have become woven into the fabric of society and thus less controversial.

Pushing deeper, anti-essentialism is not merely a theory about identity but also about challenging the societal forces that impose identity upon people in ways that further hierarchy. Through subtle forms of differentiation in society and law, sex and gender hierarchies are created, perpetuated, and normalized. These essentialist conceptions of gender tend to reinforce power differentials between men and women as well as “patriarchal assumptions about women as a group.”³⁹ They also work to reinforce power differentials among men, so that certain types of men, those that hew to a dominant form of masculinity, are empowered and other men, those who challenge or fail to conform to this dominant masculinity, are pressured into conforming or, if they do not, ostracized and/or persecuted.⁴⁰

Disaggregating the concepts of sex and gender is key to an anti-essentialist legal theory.⁴¹ Under the essentialist view of sex and gender described above, men are or should be masculine and women are or should be feminine. Biology determines behavior, so the link is required. Anti-essentialism disentangles the concepts, even going so far to challenge the idea that there should be any concept of masculinity or femininity.⁴² Anti-essentialism views characteristics of individuals as just that, individual characteristics; the characteristics should not be labeled as more appropriate for one sex than the other.⁴³ In this sense, anti-essentialism might sound very similar to equal treatment theory and the quest to break down sex-based stereotypes.⁴⁴ However, unlike equal treatment theory that accepts some differences between men and women, anti-essentialism calls into question virtually all stereotypes and categories associated with sex and gender as the product of socially-imposed categorization. And it is this socially-imposed categorization that results in the furtherance of hierarchy. As argued below, sex segregation is an important and powerful form of this socially-imposed categorization.

REV. 1, 42 (2001) (stating that a “feminist theory that destabilizes the category of women until it has become entirely indeterminate in theory sacrifices the ability to locate and contest existing societal standards adapted to fit the profile of men”). To escape this problem, Maxine Eichner recommends a legal theory that, instead of denying that a socially-understood category “women” exists, focuses “on both reducing the import of gender and on creating the legal conditions that ensure that people are offered an array of identities that depart from dominant gender images.” Id. at 47.

Anti-essentialism applied to masculinity results in the concept of masculinities. As Nancy Dowd has described it, “[a]nti-essentialism means exposing affirmative differences among men that challenge dominant definitions of masculinity.”⁴⁵ Doing so would be impossible without understanding that there is no such thing as “masculinity” (singular); instead, there are multiple “masculinities” (plural).

Sociologists have studied and theorized masculinities, challenging the notion that there is one masculinity that is exclusively for men. Two leading sociologists of masculinity, Raewyn Connell and Michael Kimmel, both conceive of masculinities as varied and contingent. In a cultural history of masculinity, Kimmel surveys how conceptions of masculinity have changed and continue to change throughout American history.⁴⁶ Within her book developing a theory and history of masculinities, Connell presents a similar review of different types of masculinities, but focuses instead on the life-histories of four Australian men.⁴⁷ Both of these works challenge the notion that there is one masculinity, both throughout history and at any one point in time.

Thus, attaching substantive content to the term “masculinity” in the form of a definitive listing of particular traits is problematic, as it is clear that masculinity is more complicated, contingent, and multiplicitous than just a simple description of what men do or how they are. Because of these difficulties, I agree with the sociologists who find it much more useful to use the concept of “multiple masculinities.” “Multiple masculinities” is the anti-essentialist notion that different people experience and live masculinity differently.⁴⁸ Stated otherwise, there is no one masculinity that all men, or even most men, live. As Rob Gilbert and Pam Gilbert write in an analysis of masculinity in Australian schools, “masculinity is diverse, dynamic and changing, and we need to think of multiple masculinities rather than some singular [masculinity].”⁴⁹ Connell explains that there are multiple masculinities:

There is considerable diversity between societies in their constructions of gender for men. This can readily be seen by comparing descriptions of masculinities in Latin America, the Middle East, southern Africa and east Asia. There is also considerable evidence that there are multiple masculinities within the same society, even within the same institution, peer group or workplace.⁵⁰

These multiple masculinities can be based on the “interplay of gender, class and ethnicity”⁵¹ as well as other identity factors such as sexual orientation, disability, and national origin. Furthermore, individual men and women can also access and perform different masculinities at different points and sites in their lives, as individual masculine identity is not static over time or within different contexts.⁵²

Just because masculinities are varied and culturally contingent does not mean that discussing them means avoiding discussion of men's power. Jeff Hearn has been critical of some masculinities scholarship as being too focused on describing masculinity without paying enough attention to critically assessing how, within a patriarchal society, men and masculinity attain and keep power over women as well as other men.⁵³ Looking at gender and power is, as I argued above, an important part of the anti-essentialist project, as essentialist notions of gender reinforce power structures. For masculinities, essentialist notions of who is a man and what is masculinity work to reinforce the dominance of men over women, as well as men who do not fit within the essentialist notion. This understanding of power and masculinity is also an important part of masculinities studies.

These theoretical frameworks about masculinities are useful for the study of sex segregation. Importantly, though these theorists have conclusively shown how there is no one masculinity, they have also convincingly argued that there is such a thing as hegemonic masculinity as well as the hegemony of men. In other words, though masculinities are varied, there are still important ways that masculinity and men shape identity and wield power. These two concepts -- hegemonic masculinity and the hegemony of men -- that are drawn from the theories of gender, anti-essentialism, and masculinities described here form the framework for the rest of this article's analysis of sex segregation and will be described and analyzed in the next two sections.

III. Hegemonic Masculinity

In this section, I argue that the various forms of sex segregation I have identified in this project are an important part of the construction of hegemonic masculinity in this country and then demonstrate how these forms of sex segregation contribute to the construction of three important characteristics of such a hegemonic masculinity -- that men are not women, are heterosexual, and are physically aggressive. Certainly, there are other structures and institutions that powerfully contribute to this dominant form of masculinity, such as family, work, media, social networks, and school, as well as cultural practices and symbols that do the same.⁵⁴ However, law and its relationship to sex segregation, whether mandatory, administrative, permissive, or voluntary, is an important part of the social structures creating and maintaining this hegemonic masculinity as well.

Hegemonic masculinity is a key concept in the study of masculinities. Though masculinities scholars have convincingly demonstrated there is no one masculinity, many have argued that there is a contextually-contingent idealized masculinity that exerts normative power over men to conform. The theory behind this dominant masculinity, labeled “hegemonic masculinity,” was first developed by Connell⁵⁵ and has most recently been defined by her as follows: “the configuration of gender practice which embodies the currently accepted answer to the problem of the legitimacy of patriarchy, which guarantees (or is taken to guarantee) the dominant position of men and the subordination of women.”⁵⁶ Stated slightly differently, hegemonic masculinity is “the currently most honored way of being a man[.]It require[s] all other men to position themselves in relation to it, and it ideologically legitimate[s] the global subordination of women to men.”⁵⁷

Unpacking this term makes clear that this is a concept that is rooted in notions of power and is contextual, dynamic, and idealized. Thus, although boys and girls, men and women, live and experience different forms of masculinity within particular contexts, within those contexts often one form of masculinity exerts the most pressure to conform to it. Hegemonic masculinity is that masculinity and works to subordinate both women and non-hegemonically masculine men.⁵⁸ It subordinates women by definition, as hegemonic masculinity is associated with the characteristics that allow men to subordinate women; it subordinates other men, non-hegemonically masculine men, by labeling their expressions of personhood as inferior to “true” manhood.

Without understanding context, though, it is impossible to say exactly what characteristics are associated with hegemonic masculinity. These characteristics change over time⁵⁹ and vary depending on culture and other identity characteristics.⁶⁰ But, in traditionally male-dominated societies, such as the United States, there are certain characteristics that are more likely to be associated with hegemonic masculinity than others.⁶¹ These characteristics are understood, in part, based on cultural practices that have institutional power behind them in forcing the cultural ideal upon people.⁶² Sex segregation, and the role of the law in ensuring or allowing it, is one such cultural practice that must be explored in its relation to hegemonic masculinity.

Important in this definition of hegemonic masculinity is the notion of hegemony. Hegemony in this context refers to an ideology of masculinity that exerts power over others through “everyday, taken-for-granted ideas and practice performed with consent [and] without coercion.”⁶³ In such a system, there are other types of masculinities that work in conjunction with the hegemonic form. Connell identifies subordinated, complicit, and marginalized masculinities. Subordinated masculinities are those that are dominated and made inferior by hegemonic masculinity.⁶⁴ Complicit masculinities are those practiced by men who do not exhibit hegemonic masculinity but benefit from its existence in its establishment of an overall pattern of subordination of women.⁶⁵ Marginalized masculinities are those exhibited by people who differ in race or class from the dominant form of masculinity. These marginalized masculinities may be consistent in some ways with hegemonic masculinity, such as, in the example Connell uses, the famous black male athlete, but will always be marginalized because of other identity characteristics.⁶⁶

Hegemonic masculinity has been critiqued in various ways, including that it is unclear in its substance.⁶⁷ However, my working premise for this article is that the notion is nonetheless useful in understanding what conceptions of masculinity exist that exert normative force on people to conform. Though it may be impossible to fully describe such a masculinity because of the wide variety of forces that influence its nature, there can be some understanding of it that can come from looking at the forces, such as law, that create and reinforce its hegemony. Sex segregation, with the power or permission of law, in the ways identified in this project, is one such force. Particularly following the feminist legal reforms of the past several decades that were supposed to eliminate invidious sex discrimination in our society, the sex segregation that remains is one of the “taken-for-granted ideas and practices” described by Hearn that is “performed with consent [and] without coercion.”⁶⁸ In that way, it is one of the important contributors to hegemonic masculinity.

Thus, when law segregates or allows for segregation across all the different areas described in this project, we can see some of the ways that law, government institutions, and cultural practices help to associate and maintain the association of particular characteristics with hegemonic masculinity. And, not surprisingly, when law segregates or allows segregation of men and women in the ways described in this project, it helps to essentialize masculinity in a way that aligns with characteristics frequently associated with men in a society in which women and non-hegemonically masculine men are subordinated. Here, I demonstrate that sex segregation contributes to and perpetuates the association of three important characteristics to hegemonic masculinity: that men are not women or feminine, that men are heterosexual, and that men are physically aggressive.

A. Not Feminine

Probably the most important aspect of most conceptions of hegemonic masculinity is that masculinity is defined as that which is not feminine, or that which is not associated with girls or women.⁶⁹ In an early feminist writing, Nancy Chodorow described how society places immense pressure on boys from an early age “to reject identification with or participation in anything that seems ‘feminine.’”⁷⁰ Some theorists, like Chodorow, attribute this need for differentiation to the Freudian need of young boys to separate from their mother;⁷¹ others associate it with the desire to associate with the more dominant part of a patriarchal society rather than the subordinated;⁷² still others attribute it to fear among men to look frail in the eyes of other men.⁷³ Regardless of the origin of this need, most gender theorists acknowledge the simple fact that the dominant societal notion of being masculine means “doing things that cannot and should not be done by women.”⁷⁴ Ultimately, masculinity requires men to “make it clear -- eternally, compulsively, decidedly -- that they are not ‘like’ women.”⁷⁵

Sex segregation in law and society is one of the basic ways that men are differentiated from what is feminine and thereby defined by that which is not feminine. In previous work on masculinity and single-sex education, I described how the current push to expand sex-segregated education for boys has been driven in large part by an essentialist view of masculinity that includes the notion that boys occupy almost completely different worlds than girls.⁷⁶ The advocates for sex segregated education for boys push for different examples to be used in class (for example, sports instead of shopping) and different books for the students to read.⁷⁷ They also believe that boys need to learn from male teachers rather than female teachers so that young boys are not “feminized” and instead have male role models to become appropriately masculine.⁷⁸ Now that the law has been changed to allow for more single-sex educational opportunities, boys will have even further differentiation from the feminine than already exists in co-educational schooling opportunities.

Moran eds. 1971). She also writes that boys, so concerned with defining themselves as masculine, are troubled because “there is no sure definition of masculinity, no way for the little boy to know if he has really made it, except insofar as he manages to differentiate himself from what he somehow vaguely defines as femininity.” Id. at 189.

One aspect of this part of hegemonic masculinity is protecting important segments of public life for men alone. Chodorow has written about this feature of hegemonic masculinity as follows: “It becomes necessary to reserve many [socially important] activities for men, to believe that women are unable to do many of the ‘important’ things that contribute to society”⁷⁹ Certainly, since the changes in the law in the 1960s and 1970s, both statutory and constitutional, most activities in this country have been opened up to women, at least in form if not in reality. However, excluded from the important barriers that have been broken is the exclusion of women from direct ground combat roles within the military.⁸⁰ This exception is the purported reason that only men are required to fulfill the patriotic duty of registering for the draft at the age of eighteen.⁸¹ In reserving registration and ground combat to men alone, the law keeps arguably the most important part of military service from women and leaves that in the hands of men.⁸² This is true both in the message this exclusion sends, that, literally, men are full citizens in their military eligibility compared to women who are limited, and in the effects of this exclusion, that men have more opportunities for leadership than women do because of their ability to participate fully in the military.⁸³

In hearings before Congress about whether to expand women’s role in the military, this aspect of masculinity was made eminently clear. Valerie Vojdik has described the testimony that was elicited in these hearings as “reflect[ing] the underlying belief that a warrior is valuable precisely because women cannot do it.”⁸⁴ Two examples are representative. One female Air Force pilot testified that a male test pilot said to her, “Look, I can handle anything, but I can’t handle being worse than you.”⁸⁵ Likewise, a Special Operations sergeant testified that “the warrior mentality will crumble if women are placed in combat positions There needs to be that belief that ‘I can do this because nobody else can.’”⁸⁶ Basic to these notions of what it means to be a man is that men can do something that is decidedly valued and equally unfeminine. Law’s continued sex segregation of part of the military helps perpetuate this part of masculinity.⁸⁷

This differentiation from women and femininity is also a key part of men’s clubs that have exclusive membership policies. Although such sentiments may not be stated outright as frequently today, Dixon Wecter stated in 1937 what lies behind many men’s decisions to join an all-male club: Man wants “his peculiar asylum from the pandemonium of commerce, the bumptiousness of democracy, and the feminism of his own household.”⁸⁸ Deborah Rhode has described these sex-segregated clubs as “retreats from work or wives.”⁸⁹

The result of men “retreating” from women is that men police each other to avoid exhibiting behaviors that would appear to be feminine. In one study of male-only interactions, a researcher concluded that men around exclusively other men believed that “emotions and behaviors typically associated with women were inappropriate within the male homosocial group.”⁹⁰ This is hardly a surprising finding, as the same thread is at work here that is at work in the examples of schools and military already discussed. Sex segregated institutions, whether segregated by mandate of law or voluntarily on the part of a private organization, contribute to the hegemonic notion of masculinity that defines being a man as not being feminine.

B. Heterosexual

Another important feature of hegemonic masculinity in this culture is that being masculine means being heterosexual. Catharine MacKinnon has argued that compulsory heterosexuality is an important part of hegemonic masculinity because it “keep[s] women sexually for men and men sexually inviolable.”⁹¹ In rejecting homosexuality and requiring heterosexuality, hegemonic masculinity again defines itself by what it is not.⁹² Homophobia is an important part of this hegemonic masculinity as well, as men, fearing that they will be perceived as gay by other men and thus “not a real man,” will “exaggerate[e] all the traditional rules of masculinity, including sexual predation with women. Homophobia and sexism go hand in hand.”⁹³ Taken to an extreme, this aspect of hegemonic masculinity can lead to violence against men who do not exhibit outward heterosexuality, from those who exhibit too much (or even any) femininity to those who are openly gay.⁹⁴

Assumed heterosexuality underlies many forms of sex segregation described in this project, and this assumption within these institutions pushes men to conform to this norm of masculine behavior.⁹⁵ This is one of the basic reasons behind the sex segregation of prisons, as men must be kept from women because men are heterosexual and will seek out sex with women, either consensually or non-consensually. This assumption of heterosexuality also plays an important role in laws and administrative policies that prohibit men from being guards in women’s prisons or conducting searches of women in criminal justice settings.⁹⁶ One such policy with respect to prisons was challenged in Everson v. Michigan Department of Corrections.⁹⁷ In upholding the restriction, the Sixth Circuit wrote that when a male guard observes a female inmate engaged in activities such as using the toilet, showering, dressing, sleeping, brushing her teeth, requesting sanitary napkins, sleeping, and waking up, he is violating her “special sense of privacy in [her] genitals, and involuntary exposure of them in the presence of people of the other sex may be especially demeaning and humiliating.”⁹⁸ In relying on this “special sense of privacy” that exists with respect to men but not women, the court is not relying on notions of safety from guards’ aggression⁹⁹ but rather referring to male guards’ heterosexuality and the harm inherently imposed on women when heterosexual men see women’s genitalia.¹⁰⁰ Of course, this harm is not the only reason behind these policies, as safety is part of the concern as well, but this assumption of heterosexuality is a major reason behind much of the sex segregation in the criminal justice system, both for prisoners and guards, as well as arrestees and police officers.

A similar dynamic is at work in restroom segregation. Although, like the prison discussion above, fear of violence is certainly part of the reason, fear of heterosexual sexual interaction is one of the reasons behind sex segregated bathrooms, whether mandatory, administrative, permissive, or voluntary.¹⁰¹ Society assumes heterosexuality; thus, men and women cannot be together in a setting involving the exposure of their reproductive organs.

If we did, then bathrooms would generally be unisex (thereby facilitating, for example, the protected heterosexual married couple’s access to each other).”).

Legal philosopher Richard A. Wasserstrom has written that the reason for sex-segregated bathrooms is heterosexual mystery: “The case against [sex segregated bathrooms] now would rest on the ground that they are, perhaps, one small part of that scheme of sex-role differentiation which uses the mystery of sexual anatomy, among other things, to maintain the primacy of heterosexual sexual attraction central to [patriarchy].”¹⁰²

Many of the other forms of sex segregation described in this project have a similar association of heterosexuality with masculinity lying behind them. The move toward single-sex education in recent years is premised on the idea that without girls in classes with them, boys will not be “distracted” because they will avoid the objects of their heterosexual desire.¹⁰³ Sex-segregated sport relies upon the stereotype of the heterosexual male athlete to bring men close together to one another, close enough that they form a family-like team, without a concern that they will be labeled gay.¹⁰⁴ All forms of sex segregated living quarters, again whether mandatory, administrative, permissive, or voluntary, assume heterosexuality. Sex-segregated health clubs, often permitted by law but frequently just voluntarily formed for women, also assume heterosexual male desire.¹⁰⁵ And sex segregation in overnight jury sequestration and massage performance also are based on the same assumptions.

The message delivered about masculinity¹⁰⁶ in separating men in all of these environments is that men are heterosexual and do not have sex with other men. Furthermore, to preserve heterosexuality, men must be prohibited from being exposed to women in private moments. The norm is heterosexuality; the aberration is homosexuality. Laws or policies that segregate based on sex out of fear of heterosexual sexual relationships contribute to and perpetuate the construction of hegemonic masculinity as heterosexual.

Of course, the irony is that, despite heterosexuality being an important component of the construction of hegemonic masculinity, by segregating based on sex, law and society create more opportunities for same-sex sexual interaction. As one queer theorist has written:

It is possible to argue that the social organization of Western society promotes homosexuality, or at least makes such activity possible. Most social, political and educational institutions (with the exception of the family) have been organized along strict division of the sexes. . . . If one wanted to design a system better calculated to promote opportunities to foster homosexual affection and activity, it would be difficult to improve upon the system which has operated in the West across many centuries.¹⁰⁷

Familiar examples abound that prove this point about sex segregation. Sex segregated bathrooms provided the opportunity for Senator Larry Craig to allegedly proposition another man in the Minneapolis airport in 2007.¹⁰⁸ In the context of sex segregated men's prisons, the occurrence of prison rape is widely known, but there are other forms of sexual contact that also take place between men in prison, with a variety of complications and complexities.¹⁰⁹ Researchers have looked at "pseudo-consensual" sex between men in prison and determined that sex segregation is an important part of producing an environment in prison in which same-sex sexual behavior occurs.¹¹⁰

C. Physically Aggressive

Certainly one of the most prominent stereotypes associated with hegemonic masculinity is that men are physically aggressive. Most believers in a "true" form of masculinity associate men with being more aggressive than women. Connell calls this belief part of the "modern gender ideology, in the English-speaking world at least."¹¹¹ For African-American men, this stereotype is particularly prominent, as society views one dominant conception of being a black man as being overly aggressive.¹¹² And, while it is certainly true that men do exhibit aggression in a variety of ways,¹¹³ it is important to understand the way that institutions and social practices contribute to the stereotype and its instantiation in reality.¹¹⁴ For scholars of masculinities, one of the reasons for the realities of male aggression is that “being violent is one socially recognized way of being a man.”¹¹⁵

Sex segregation is one of the ways that the association between hegemonic masculinity and aggression is created and perpetuated. The Supreme Court has twice given its approval of the association of men with aggression in contexts of sex segregation. In Rostker v. Goldberg, as discussed above, the Court found that women could be excluded from registering for the draft because women were not eligible for combat roles in the military.¹¹⁶ In approving the segregation of the draft, the Court left unquestioned the sex segregation of combat roles. By reserving this aspect of warfare to men and men alone, the Court implicitly approved this association of aggression as a key part of masculinity.¹¹⁷ Although the specifics of the exclusion of women from combat have changed since Rostker,¹¹⁸ the basic prohibition remains, and therefore, the basic connection between men and aggression does as well. With the requirement on men and men alone to register for the draft subject to various penalties, “[t]he civic obligation of men is clear: The concept of citizenship for men is intricately tied to fighting.”¹¹⁹

Likewise, in Dothard v. Rawlinson,¹²⁰ the Supreme Court more explicitly relied on this stereotype about men. In Dothard, the Court found that Alabama’s prohibition on women serving as guards in a maximum-security men’s prison was permissible under Title VII’s scheme that permits sex segregation in employment.¹²¹ The Court’s justification was that the men in the prison were naturally aggressive, which would be activated by women’s presence.¹²² The same assumption about men’s natural aggression underlies decisions from various courts that have allowed women’s prisons to exclude men from positions as guards. In those cases, the courts view the relationship between prisoner and guard completely opposite of the situation in Dothard. In these cases, the prisoners are not seen as aggressive but rather the guards are. The difference is that the prisoners are the women and the guards are the men, thus the aggression flows from the men to the women, not from prisoner to guard as it did in Dothard.¹²³ In these decisions, “men are by nature sexual predators,”¹²⁴ and sex segregation in prison employment is required. The same stereotype of hegemonic masculinity as aggressive that underlies these employment cases are at the heart of the various prohibitions on cross-sex searches in criminal justice environments as well as the basic sex segregation of prison populations.¹²⁵

Certainly other considerations, such as privacy, form the basis for these forms of segregation. However, as discussed, the privacy concerns have different bases for men and women, almost always focusing on Sex-segregated school is another example. In analyzing the current trend toward single-sex education and its focus on the needs of boys, I concluded that one of the central features of this push to sex segregate boys is the belief that boys need to be taught in a way that matches their natural aggression, something girls do not possess.¹²⁶ Verna Williams has similarly looked at the rhetoric of single-sex education as being rooted in a perceived need to address the problems associated with the aggression of black males.¹²⁷ In fact, the stereotype of the aggressive black male was one of the reasons sex segregation in schools expanded after *Brown v. Board of Education*¹²⁸ and the fall of Jim Crow. Because white parents feared this stereotype, they pushed to keep their daughters separate from African-American boys the only way law would allow once race discrimination was unlawful -- through sex segregation.¹²⁹

Beyond the military, prisons, and schools, the stereotype of male aggression forms the basis of much of the sex segregation discussed in this project. For instance, after looking into the history of the sex segregation of bathrooms, Terry Kogan concluded that “[s]eparate public restrooms for men and women foster subtle social understandings that women are inherently vulnerable and in need of protection when in public, while men are inherently predatory.”¹³⁰ Also, in the context of sport, part of the justification for sex segregation is to protect women from injury if they were to compete against the natural aggression of men.¹³¹

Associating hegemonic masculinity with physical aggression, as with not being feminine and being heterosexual, is not the work of sex segregation alone. Other powerful forces in American life do this as well. That sex segregation does not create the content of hegemonic masculinity by itself is immaterial, as no one institution can claim credit for such a dominant force. However, sex segregation in its taken-for-granted forms that persist today is one important vehicle for hegemonic masculinity to gain and reinforce its content.

IV. The Hegemony of Men

As I discussed earlier,¹³² challenging socially constructed notions of identity is one key part of an anti-essentialist view of gender. The previous section’s focus on hegemonic masculinity, along with its analysis of the harms that flow from such a hegemonic notion of masculinity, falls within this part of the anti-essentialist project.

However, focusing on the multiplicity of identity is not the only part of anti-essentialism; another key part is focusing on equality issues and how power relates to the construction of a seemingly-essential identity. In critiquing some of the shortcomings of the concept of hegemonic masculinity, Jeff Hearn has argued that attention should be focused less on that identity concept and more on the way that men, as constructed within society, use power to subordinate women. He calls this an investigation into “the hegemony of men.”¹³³

Hearn argues that any critical feminist analysis of men must be concerned about this power that men use to subordinate women. By focusing on hegemonic masculinity alone, scholars are right to look to the way that men are “a social category formed by the gender system,” but should also look at how men are “dominant collective and individual agents of social practices.”¹³⁴ “In this view,” he continues, “there is a greater need to look critically at the ordinary, take-for-granted accepted dominant constructions, powers and authorities of men -- in relation to women, children and other men, both men who are subordinate and those who are superordinate.”¹³⁵ As another scholar has written about the inquiry into the hegemony of men, beyond looking at the “complex, fluid and contradictory” nature of identity, which is the inquiry into hegemonic masculinity, “it is imperative not to ignore the asymmetrical relationship between men and women and between masculinities and femininities in western societies.”¹³⁶

A project looking into the hegemony of men has several components, with power at the heart of each of them. One of the components Hearn identified that is relevant to this project on sex segregation is focusing on the ways that the concept of “men” becomes hegemonic, with its taken-for-granted domination through consent.¹³⁷ Scholars must look to “the formation of the social category of men” and the social processes by which the category is accepted.¹³⁸ Hearn asks the question: “[W]hat are the various dominant ways that there are for governmentally categorizing men -- by the state, the law, medical sciences, social sciences, religion, business, and so on -- and how [do] these intersect with, complement and contradict one another?”¹³⁹ Answering this question requires looking into “the mass of [] organizational and institutional ways in which particular men are placed within the social category of men.”¹⁴⁰

A second component Hearn has identified as a central part of this project is understanding and analyzing the “system of distinctions and categorizations between different forms of men and men’s practices to women, children, and other men.”¹⁴¹ In other words, Hearn is suggesting that scholars must study the way that men have differentiated themselves in ways that allow them to exercise power over women, children, and other men. The social structures and systems that perform this function are an important part of the hegemony of men. These social structures and systems might be, as Hearn describes them in a related portion of his agenda for studying the “hegemony of men,” men’s most “natural(ized), ordinary, normal and most taken-for-granted practices.”¹⁴² These practices, including, as I argue below, various forms of sex segregation, help us understand men’s dominance over women and non-hegemonically masculine men.

Although Hearn sets forth this concept of hegemony of men as mostly an alternative to studying hegemonic masculinity, I find the two useful to discuss in tandem. As the previous section argued, the forms of sex segregation that continue to exist in this country work together to create hegemonic notions of masculinity. In other words, there are common threads that run through the forms of sex segregation that create a powerful message of what it means to be a man. The harms associated with it cascade to women, non-hegemonically masculine men, and ultimately all men, in the sense that behavior and personality for everyone is constricted by masculinity norms. Although there are indeed theoretical problems with the notion of hegemonic masculinity,¹⁴³ the existence of a patterned ideal, or at least some semblance of such an ideal, and understanding aspects of such an idealized masculinity are important.

However, as Hearn argues, that is not enough. And understanding this hegemony of men, as described by Hearn, is important as well. By looking to how sex segregation creates opportunities for men to build or maintain power over women and other men, we can see part of the social structures that contribute to patriarchy. To the extent that these structures are less controversial at this point in time, particularly given that these forms of sex segregation have continued to exist even after the feminist legal reforms of the past several decades, shows that present-day sex segregation is just the type of taken-for-granted practice that Hearn contemplates in his discussion of hegemony. And, to the extent that these practices effectively use power to promote an essentialist view of masculinity, investigating them within the lens of hegemony is an important part of an anti-essentialist project.

Based on these forms of sex segregation and working from Hearn’s agenda for investigating the hegemony of men, I will discuss four forms of hegemonic practice that involve sex segregation. First, I will demonstrate that sex segregation contributes to the social acceptance of the category “men.” Second, I will argue that sex segregated space occupied by men functions to restrict the transfer of socially-valuable knowledge to other men and limit it from women. Third, I argue that sex segregation gives men an opportunity to foster and grow negative attitudes about women that contribute to the oppression of women. Fourth, I will also argue that sex segregation is a site for policing gender conformity and punishing those men who do not exhibit hegemonic masculinity. In each of these important ways, sex segregation contributes to, not only a hegemonic form of masculinity that harms individual identity ¹⁴² Id. at 61. The three different parts of the “hegemony of men” agenda I discuss in the text are Hearn’s first, second, and fifth items. Hearn also has four other parts of the “hegemony of men” agenda that are less relevant to the study of sex segregation I undertake here. See id. at 60-61.

formation, but also the hegemony of men that subordinates women and non-hegemonically masculine men.

A. The Category of “Men”

Hearn’s first charge in investigating the hegemony of men is looking to “organizational and institutional ways in which particular men are placed within the social category of men.”¹⁴⁴ By doing so, we can unmask how society creates the category “men” as separate from the category “women.” At its most basic level, this is exactly what sex segregation in all its forms does. In particular, when law mandates segregation of men and women, it is making this basic distinction through which people understand that this categorization matters and that deviating from this categorization has consequences. Through mandatory as well as the other forms of sex segregation that weave their ways through our lives, we come to accept the seemingly natural distinction that is created each time we see the word “men” or the word “women.” The categories are set up as oppositional and as a legitimate way of thinking about people. The categories are also established as having no gray areas on the margins -- a person is either a man or a woman.

The various forms of sex segregation discussed in this project accomplish this categorization of men throughout men’s lives. At an early age, boys encounter the issue when they have to enter a public restroom. If a father accompanies his son, sex segregation poses no problem. However, if a mother accompanies her son, the sex segregated world of bathrooms poses a problem: does the mother take her son into the women’s room or does she send her young son into the men’s room unattended?¹⁴⁵ However the mother resolves the issue, the lesson from sex segregation comes through. This lesson of categorization continues throughout life and is what French theorist Jacques Lacan calls “urinary segregation.”¹⁴⁶ Urinary segregation, according to Lacan, teaches children and adults that sexual difference is eternal, uncompromising, and based in notions of superiority.¹⁴⁷ Basic human similarity between men and women, in the sense that everyone must eliminate waste and that everyone does so in quite similar ways, becomes a site of constructed difference masquerading as natural.¹⁴⁸

Architectural theorist Joel Sanders expands upon Lacan’s theory of language as the differentiator to include the arrangement of space in sex segregating bathrooms. He argues that sex segregation of the “public bathroom assigns sex and gender identity. The architecture of the public bathroom, where physical walls literally segregate the sexes, naturalizes gender by separating ‘men’ and ‘women’ according to the biology of bodily functions.”¹⁴⁹ Not only does this segregation reinforce the opposition of the categories of “men” and “women,” it also reinforces the notion that sex is binary without room for transsexuals, transgendered, or intersexed people.¹⁵⁰

Sex segregated sport produces the same effect from an early age. Children participating in youth sports leagues are often segregated by sex. Even though at early ages children’s athletic ability usually does not vary based on sex, leagues grouped by sex tell children that sex is a salient characteristic that matters in how children are treated and re-affirm for parents that sex differences are a naturally occurring way to differentiate children.¹⁵¹ “The result [is] an apparently ‘natural’ split based on apparently ‘natural’ sex differences. What we already believed -- that boys and girls are categorically different -- became what we saw.”¹⁵²

This emphasis on binary difference and categorization, with its concomitant creation of the social category “man,” also comes through in sex segregated school settings. In one of the studies following California’s experiment with single-sex academies, the researchers found that sex segregation “heightened awareness of gender as a category to define students.”¹⁵³ The students understood that sex was the organizing basis for the schools, and thus internalized the message that it was a binary distinction central to understanding people. Delivering this understanding of who is male and who is female is an essential part of single-sex education.

The particular message of sex segregation and the hegemony of men as a category also comes through in the military context. At the age of eighteen, every man has to register for the military draft¹⁵⁴ and is subject to penalties if he does not.¹⁵⁵ Each man who does so (or men who understand that they must do so but choose not to) is once again confronted, through the power of a mandate backed with serious penalties, with being categorized as a man and being considered, because of being a man, a potential part of a fighting force that would serve the country. Along with this message comes the message that there is a separate category “woman” who is different and does not fit this description.

This message comes through in other areas as well. In sex-segregated prisons, prisoners are classified based on what level of security they need and based on their sex, suggesting that sex is an important characteristic that by itself defines people. In sex-segregated voluntary groupings or clubs based on hobbies or interests, the message delivered from the act of sex segregation is that sex is a legitimate way to classify people beyond their shared interest or commitment. This message, that reproductive anatomy matters in classifying and categorizing, is at the heart of most sex segregation.

B. Knowledge

In her discussion of masculinities studies and its intersection with law, Nancy Dowd talks about the way geographers and architectural theorists have described how “space supports dominance,” particularly in spaces associated with one sex.¹⁵⁶ In this way, space is another site of the social construction of sex and gender.¹⁵⁷ Architectural theorist Daphne Spain has written about the way men expand power through the use of space exclusively reserved for men. Spain argues that when sex segregation in space is pronounced, men occupy a higher, more powerful status than women do.¹⁵⁸

Spain makes this argument by studying dwellings, schools, and workplaces both cross-culturally and historically.¹⁵⁹ What she finds is that “the physical separation of women and men [] contributes to and perpetuates gender stratification by reducing women’s access to socially valued knowledge.”¹⁶⁰ In a patriarchal society, this effect of sex segregation is even more pronounced, as the most socially valuable knowledge is in the possession of men.¹⁶¹ Spain writes that “[i]nsofar as men have an initial advantage [] and insofar as women and men are separated in places where they live, learn, and work, women’s status will be lower than men’s because they have less access to knowledge.”¹⁶²

Spain argues that “[w]hen gender segregation is imposed by custom or law [], it typically operates to maintain the privileges of those with the highest status.”¹⁶³ Particularly relevant to Hearn’s theory of the hegemony of men, Spain calls these gendered spaces “taken for granted” because society comes to accept them as natural.¹⁶⁴ Modifying these gendered spaces can work to improve women’s status in society because, in comparison with sex segregation’s effect of limiting the transmission of knowledge, sex integration in physical arrangements can facilitate the exchange of valuable information from those with power to those without power, in other words, from men to women.¹⁶⁵

Spain elaborates in a way that directly connects her enterprise with Hearn’s discussion of hegemony as power that is perceived as natural and thus consented to: “Spatial arrangements typically fall into the category of things we do not think about. ¹⁶⁵ Id. at 137, 147. Spain concludes that this observation “creates an avenue for action.” Id. at 147.

Many of the forms of sex segregation I have identified in this project are excellent examples of this type of gendered space. The most obvious environment in which Spain's argument has traction is in the context of single-sex education, as schools are, by definition, the space in which knowledge is transferred. And, in fact, the way that knowledge transfer is unequal in sex-segregated space within a patriarchal society played a major role in the litigation of two of the high-profile single-sex education cases. In the litigation surrounding Philadelphia's single-sex academic high schools in the 1970s and early 1980s,¹⁶⁶ the courts and litigants focused heavily on the ways that the all-boys academic high school provided greater access to knowledge than the all-girls academic high school. Even though both graduated students to college at similarly high rates,¹⁶⁷ the evidence showed that the boys' school gave students more opportunity to access knowledge than the girls' school did. For instance, boys learned from teachers with greater knowledge-bases in the subjects they taught,¹⁶⁸ boys had access to almost twice as many books in their library,¹⁶⁹ boys had opportunities to take a wider range of courses,¹⁷⁰ and boys had an alumni network that was much more extensive, accomplished, and active in networking with the students.¹⁷¹ Almost directly evidencing the knowledge differential associated with sex segregation, the boys' school alumni network featured annual gatherings that attracted prominent guests in a variety of fields, including the President of the United Nations General Assembly, the Vice-President of the United States, the Attorney General of the United States, and a former Supreme Court Justice.¹⁷² The girls' school had no comparable list of speakers for its alumnae or students.¹⁷³

This aspect of sex segregation was also a key part of the Supreme Court's decision in the challenge to Virginia's sex-segregated public military academy, the Virginia Military Institute.¹⁷⁴ In that case, Virginia proposed an all-women's school, the Virginia Women's Institute for Leadership, to remedy any possible constitutional violation that existed in having an all-men's military academy.¹⁷⁵ However, like the girls' school in Philadelphia, the site of the proposed women's military school, Mary Baldwin College, has a less-credentialed faculty and fewer opportunities for degrees.¹⁷⁶ In finding the proposed school insufficient to remedy the constitutional violation, the Court also focused on the alumni network that the men's school would have access to that the women’s school would not.¹⁷⁷ The Court concluded that the men’s school “beyond question, ‘possesses to a far greater degree’ than the [proposed women’s school] ‘those qualities which are incapable of objective measurement but which make for greatness in a school’”¹⁷⁸ What the Court refers to here, which is the same thing that was at the heart of the Philadelphia litigation, is that sex segregation in education gives men more access to socially-valuable knowledge than women, which in turn gives men greater access to more powerful positions in society.

The school cases illustrate the power of this argument about sex segregation restricting access to socially-valuable knowledge; however, both of the highlighted cases involved sex segregation that was clearly unequal, as both female-only schools provided markedly inferior benefits to their students than the male-only schools. Nonetheless, this argument about sex segregation and socially-valuable knowledge has as much purchase in other, more superficially equal, environments as well.

Restrooms, both private and public, can serve this function. Restrooms are an important part of women’s equality, as the unequal provision of restrooms has plagued women’s participation in the public sphere.¹⁷⁹ However, even if women’s restrooms are sufficient and equal to men’s, the mere fact of segregating restrooms can increase sex stratification. Although certainly not their primary purpose, non-single restrooms provide an opportunity for people to talk with one another. In an extensive study of behavior in public restrooms, one researcher found that “[w]hereas some [interactions in the public spaces of restrooms] may consist of no more than a brief exchange of smiles, others may involve lengthy conversations that reaffirm the participants’ shared biography.”¹⁸⁰ These interactions can occur in the open space of the restroom at the sinks, where individuals congregate,¹⁸¹ as well as, in men’s restrooms, when men are close to one another without visual separators while using urinals.¹⁸² In the less open space of a restroom, both men and women are separated from each other when they use stalls, which form a barrier to face-to-face conversation, although not to conversation entirely.¹⁸³ Restrooms also perform the function of giving individuals the opportunity to take an emotional or mental break from the stress of non-restroom life.¹⁸⁴ When an individual needs this kind of a break, it is not uncommon for someone of the same sex to join this individual in the restroom in order to give the person comfort or inquire about whether the individual needs help or support.¹⁸⁵

With restrooms largely sex segregated in all the forms of sex segregation described in this project, they provide an important arena for men to engage with other men and exchange socially-valuable knowledge. The conversations that occur in the restroom can be anything from a brief exchange acknowledging someone's presence to comforting or supporting another to a lengthy conversation about the two individuals' connection. This conversational opportunity is reserved for people of the same sex only. In an environment in which men hold power, for example a work environment where men hold the positions of authority, that means that other men, and not women, have this added opportunity to converse with men in authority. Conversation can be as simple as what the individuals did over the weekend to as engaged as a continuation of a substantive conversation that was started outside the restroom. This kind of conversation, from the trivial to the substantive, performs, at a minimum, the job of creating greater familiarity between the two individuals; taken further, especially if the conversations recur on a regular basis as they would, for instance, in a regularly shared bathroom, they give the individuals more of a substantive connection with one another that can be drawn upon in the future, either consciously or subconsciously, in the work environment. In a world in which more men have positions of power than women, this sex segregation of bathrooms is exactly the type of opportunity for an exchange of socially-valuable information that can lead to maintaining or furthering the subordination of women, as these conversations and opportunities for interaction occur in a space from which women are excluded.

The same logic holds for many of the other sex segregated areas studied here. Sex segregated athletics, such as local recreational leagues or pick-up games, provide the opportunity for men to be with other men, to the exclusion of women. While playing most sports, there are opportunities to have a conversation, whether during the activity itself, at a break, or before or after the sport. Sex segregation in golf courses in particular has come under attack because of the important role golf has in networking in American law and business worlds.¹⁸⁶ With women excluded from some courses entirely, from particular tee times, or particular areas of country clubs or golf courses, men retain opportunities to network and pass on important socially-valuable knowledge to other men to the exclusion of women.¹⁸⁷ Social clubs, such as the voluntarily sex segregated membership organizations described in this project, perform similar opportunities for men to engage with other men, often in leadership positions.¹⁸⁸ Sex segregation in religious institutions does the same for men who share a religion.

In all of these institutions, as with the restrooms discussed above, even if the separate opportunities are equal in quality for men and women, the opportunities provided for men to interact with other men to the exclusion of women provide the exact environment that Daphne Spain described. Women will have less access to knowledge, and men will have the ability to share socially-valuable knowledge among themselves. As a result, these various mostly taken-for-granted forms of sex segregation perpetuate gender stratification in society and are a part of the hegemony of men.

C. Attitudes About Women

Another feature of the hegemony of men to which sex segregation contributes is men's negative attitudes about women. Simply put, when men are in sex segregated environments, they engage in behavior that creates, reinforces, and exacerbates negative attitudes about women that contribute to men's oppression of women. This occurs in a variety of ways, such as seeing women as inferior, perceiving women as sex objects, or conceiving women as threats to male privilege. When these attitudes are created, reinforced, or exacerbated, men further their dominance over women.

Sociologist and masculinities scholar Michael Kimmel has identified three basic psychological processes that contribute to male sex segregation leading to negative attitudes about women.¹⁸⁹ First, the "outgroup homogeneity effect" is the belief that all members of a group of people not in the "ingroup" are the same.¹⁹⁰ Thus, a group of men who exclude women would believe that all women are the same. Second, the "ingroup superiority effect" is the belief that members of the ingroup are superior to the people who are not part of the ingroup.¹⁹¹ In the sex segregation context, this effect would mean that a group of men who exclude women would believe that men are superior to women. Finally, "groupthink" occurs when a particularly cohesive group strives for unanimity which overrides the group's motivation to evaluate any dissenting thought within the group.¹⁹² For segregation based on sex, groupthink would mean that men who might feel otherwise about women, that they are not inferior, would "forego or dismiss their own independent thinking."¹⁹³

The flipside of these effects is that people are less prejudiced and less subject to groupthink about the outgroup's inferiority when they have contact with people from the outgroup.¹⁹⁴ This contact works to break down stereotypes and increase positive perceptions of the other group. Of course, there is a deep and nuanced literature about when these effects are more or less likely to be present within a group,¹⁹⁵ but they are nonetheless basic psychological phenomena that have important implications for sex segregated groups of men.

Studies of men's peer groups have shown how these effects contribute to attitudes of male dominance. In particular, sociologist Miriam Johnson has argued that "males tend to be more concerned than females with preserving gender distinctions and male superiority [and that] these tendencies are more likely to develop in separate male groupings than in any direct early interactions with females."¹⁹⁶ She cites a variety of evidence to support her argument. For instance, studies of sex segregation of young children's peer groups show that boys have a "greater need to consolidate a new gender identity, which in turn is shored up by denigrating girls."¹⁹⁷ She also discusses the tendency of men, when interacting in the absence of women, to talk of women as sex objects, to use demeaning sexual language to describe women, and to see heterosexuality as the equivalent of male domination over women.¹⁹⁸ One study of such interactions looked at men joking with other men and without women present. The study found that when women are not present, men tell jokes about women that are sexual, aggressive, and hostile.¹⁹⁹ A large-scale study of Oregon youth found that this kind of talk about women can increase the likelihood of aggression toward women.²⁰⁰

In its most severe form, this type of thinking about women that is partly created and perpetuated by sex segregation of men manifests itself in sexual violence. A study of almost 3,000 male students at 32 American colleges found that serious sexual aggression by men was linked to male "involvement in peer groups that reinforce highly sexualized views of women."²⁰¹ Summarizing the extensive work that she has done comparing different cultures and the relationship between sex segregation and rape, Peggy Sanday writes:

Cross-cultural research demonstrates that whenever men build and give allegiance to a mystical, enduring, all-male social group, the disparagement of women is, invariably, an important ingredient of the mystical bond, and sexual aggression the means by which the bond is renewed. As long as exclusive male clubs exist in a society that privileges men as a social category, we must recognize that collective sexual aggression provides a ready stage on which some men represent their social privilege and introduce adolescent boys to their future place in the status hierarchy.²⁰²

Michael Kimmel, in his study of adolescent males, also attributes the high incidence of sexual entitlement and rape among men in fraternities and other all-male organizations to the fact that these men are members of organizations that have “elite status.”²⁰³ The evidence certainly does not lead to the conclusion that all men who are in sex segregated environments will engage in sexual aggression; however, sex segregation of men in the context of a male dominated society, particularly when that sex segregation leads to viewing women as sexualized objects, will increase its likelihood.

These group dynamics that lead men in sex segregated environments to have destructive views of women have been found to occur in several of the sex segregated contexts discussed in this project. For instance, sex segregation of schools has been linked to negative views about girls and women among boys and men. As Elisabeth Woody has summarized the discussions, “single-sex education for boys is often conceived as an opportunity to restore traditional sex roles.”²⁰⁴ In a report summarizing California’s experience with single-sex education in its public school system,²⁰⁵ the researchers found that most of the boys’ teachers, if they even had a discussion about gender, discussed “traditional conceptions of gender roles.”²⁰⁶ These traditional conceptions of gender included “the assumption that men are stronger than women.”²⁰⁷ Another report on the experiment found that “[s]eparating girls and boys heightened students’ sense of boys as a unified group in opposition to boys”²⁰⁸ Research on single-sex educational programs for boys generally finds that such programs reinforce traditional notions of gender hierarchy and the belief that girls are inferior.²⁰⁹ These findings are consistent with studies about childhood sex segregation which show that sex segregation in childhood play groups “may also form the basis for the perpetuation of male dominance.”²¹⁰

Sport is another area where men who are sex segregated develop negative attitudes about women. In one study of sex segregated men’s rugby teams, the researcher concluded that the men on the teams “continually and simultaneously construct relationally contrasting, often quite misogynistic, images of femininity.”²¹¹ Specifically, the men engaged in sexually harassing women who walked by practice, making derogatory comments at other players that associated them with being female, holding after-match parties at which women were treated like sex objects, and singing “rugby songs” that had misogynistic, often violently so, lyrics.²¹² In a different context, a survey of male athlete’s autobiographies found that the sex segregated environment allowed “misogyny [] to foment.”²¹³ In the sex segregated locker rooms and buses, the talk among the men “includes insults directed at players’ wives, sisters, mothers, or girlfriends.”²¹⁴ Michael Messner, a leading sociologist of sport and masculinities, describes the way that locker room banter among male athletes (who are not in the presence of women) involves sexually aggressive talk about dominating women.²¹⁵ This type of behavior is present in environments from Little League Baseball²¹⁶ to college men’s locker rooms.²¹⁷ Messner also focuses on empathy for women and concludes that “[h]omosocial bonding among men, especially when the bond is the sort of sexualized dominance bonding [discussed in the locker room context], is a very poor environment for the development of empathy for women.”²¹⁸

Perhaps the most obvious sex segregated environment in which men develop negative attitudes about women is fraternities. Quantitative analysis has found the following about men in fraternities:

[They] have more traditional attitudes toward women and are more likely than other men to believe that women enjoy being physically “roughed up,” that women pretend not to want sex but want to be forced into sex, that men should be controllers of relationships, that sexually liberated women are promiscuous and will probably have sex with anyone, and that women secretly desire to be raped.²¹⁹

More qualitative anthropological analysis has found that fraternity rituals and male bonding work together to develop similar misogynist attitudes toward women.²²⁰ These attitudes include the belief that men must be sexually dominant, that sexual harassment of women is necessary to male bonding, and that women must be available for sex with men.²²¹

Another context for the degradation of women occurs in graffiti that appears in sex-segregated bathrooms. Seeing misogynist graffiti in men's bathrooms is commonplace. Sanday describes some such graffiti occurring on a university campus as degrading and delivering the message of male sexual aggression toward women and women's passivity in response.²²²

Johnson is very clear in her analysis about men in sex-segregated environments that this type of thinking is not "typical of all males nor of all of the thinking about women of even some males";²²³ however, men who do not partake in this type of "sex-objectifying of women" can be shunned, punished, or worse.²²⁴ This type of thinking, she argues, is nonetheless a common part of "male-peer-group thinking, and it is most evident when women are not around to counteract it"²²⁵ The examples of sex segregation described here are evidence of this effect.

D. Attitudes About Non-Hegemonically Masculine Men

An almost necessary component of the development of negative and dominating attitudes about women in sex segregated groups of men is the development of similar attitudes about men who do not conform to the hegemonic masculinity expected of them. Male peer groups actively work to police the boundaries of acceptable behavior for boys and men.²²⁶ This boundary policing occurs more frequently with groups of men and boys than with groups of women and girls because men and boys, as the more high-status group in society, are more invested in maintaining the group identity.²²⁷ Moreover, males crossing gender boundaries threaten perceptions of in-group cohesiveness and out-group inferiority; in other words, if non-gender conforming males were accepted by their male peer groups, they would call into question the cohesive identity of the group of males and risk making women look less inferior.²²⁸ When men display negative and dominating attitudes toward non-gender conforming males they also demonstrate to themselves and others that they are not feminine or gay and that they are indeed men and masculine.²²⁹

This development of negative and dominating attitudes toward gender-nonconforming males is evident in many of the sex segregated settings described in this project. With respect to sex segregated schooling, one of the studies of California’s pilot single-sex educational institutions found that boys in the all-boys schools “set the rules of masculinity” by demeaning boys who crossed gender lines with homophobic teasing.²³⁰ Surveying the research on this issue in the context of sex-segregated schools, Wayne Martino and Bob Meyenn write that “regardless of sexual orientation, those boys who fail to match the expectations of hegemonic heterosexual masculinity are more at risk from the harassing behaviours of other boys as opposed to their female peers.”²³¹

Sex-segregated sport is another area in which this gender policing occurs to the detriment of non-conforming men. The rugby study discussed above found that men on the sex-segregated teams used the same demeaning practices against gender non-conforming men that they used against women.²³² Messner found that gender non-conforming behavior was policed in all-male locker rooms through derogatory homophobic targeting of individuals who revealed a less traditionally masculine side of their personality.²³³ As an example of the severity of the punishment for gender-nonconformity, he highlights the way a closeted gay male athlete would join his peers in the locker room in engaging in aggressive sexual banter directed at women.²³⁴ A study of college men’s locker rooms found violent comments and derogatory jokes about gay men to occur “because it helps distance the athletes from being categorized as gay themselves.”²³⁵

As with the degradation of women, sex segregated bathrooms for men also provide a space for gender policing. Men who do not conform to hegemonic masculinity are subject to harassment and violence in sex-segregated bathrooms, especially adolescents in schools.²³⁶

Similar to misogynist graffiti on the walls of men's bathrooms, anti-gay graffiti is a regular occurrence in men's bathrooms as well.²³⁷ One researcher describes such bathroom graffiti as follows: "The graffiti assume an antigay, even homophobic, audience, and aim to mobilize its homophobia, at once coordinating and displaying the social relations in which the graffiti are embedded and that they activate."²³⁸ Gender policing also occurs in the form of the unwritten rules of bathroom etiquette that are premised on heterosexuality and avoiding appearance of homosexuality.²³⁹ Unlike in other contexts, the policing of homosexuality in bathrooms has the unique feature of it occurring from the state in the form of police arrests for sexual activity in bathrooms.²⁴⁰

Non-hegemonically masculine men are also treated poorly in sex-segregated prisons. Some correctional institutions have protective custody for such men who are threatened in the general population. One study of men who had taken advantage of such protective custody found that gay and bisexual prisoners were more likely to feel like they were being treated poorly by other prisoners and guards than heterosexual men.²⁴¹ Another study summarized and confirmed decades of findings that men who did not exhibit hegemonic masculinity within the prison context were abused or raped.²⁴²

V. Conclusion

The two aspects of sex segregation's impact on masculinity and men discussed here, its construction of hegemonic masculinity and its perpetuation of the hegemony of men, are important components of fully understanding modern sex segregation. The characteristics that sex segregation associates with hegemonic masculinity that I have identified here -- that men are not feminine, that men are heterosexual, and that men are physically aggressive -- constrict male identity in a way that harms women and men, albeit in different ways. Such hegemonic masculinity harms women, as they are subject to the discrimination and abuse that stems from men who struggle to achieve dominant conceptions of masculinity.²⁴³ It also harms men who do not exhibit hegemonic masculinity, as they are also subject to violence for challenging or ignoring gender norms.²⁴⁴ More broadly, hegemonic masculinity, constructed in part from the instances of sex segregation described in this project, harms all men, regardless of how close they come to the hegemonic ideal, who feel the pressure to shape their identity at various points of time in their lives based on this ideal that may or may not correspond to their felt sense of identity. In this sense, institutions such as sex segregation force men to “do gender” or “perform gender” in the way that post-modern and anti-essentialist gender theorists have described.

But the severe impact on identity is not the only import of sex segregation with respect to men and masculinity. Sex segregation also contributes to the hegemony of men in the sense that it is a taken-for-granted institution that helps to create and perpetuate men’s dominance over women. As anti-essentialism teaches us, this dominance is hardly a natural phenomenon; rather, it is constructed and becomes part of what is perceived as an essential part of masculinity and men. Unmasking the construction of this hegemony is part of any anti-essentialist project. As detailed above, sex segregation is part of the construction of this hegemony in two important ways. First, it helps to create a seemingly-naturalized dichotomy between “man” and “woman.” Second, it helps to create environments in which men’s relationship to women and other non-hegemonically masculine men is one of dominance. This occurs through restricting the transfer of socially-valuable knowledge to other men as well as through the fostering of negative attitudes about women and non-hegemonically masculine men.

These concerns about sex segregation’s impact on hegemonic masculinity and the hegemony of men do not alone form a conclusive argument against all forms of sex segregation, and coming to that conclusion is beyond the scope of this article. Other pieces of the puzzle need to be considered as well, such as sex segregation’s implications for transgendered and intersex individuals, for women, for people of color, and others. I hope to delve into these topics in the future as part of this larger project. But, in the meantime, the harms of sex segregation described here with respect to masculinity and men are severe and need to be accounted for by anyone who tries to justify the modern state of sex segregation in law and society.
