A WELL REGULATED MILITIA: THE FOUNDING FATHERS AND THE ORIGIN OF GUN CONTROL IN AMERICA

Reviewed by David T. Hardy

“Everything of a controvertible nature,” James Madison noted regarding his proposed Bill of Rights, “has been studiously avoided.”¹ We may wonder what he would think of the 217 years of controversy that followed.

For most provisions of the Bill of Rights, the controversies have focused upon their boundaries and limitations. What is an “unreasonable search,” a “compelled” self-incrimination, an “establishment” of religion? In the case of the Second Amendment² the dispute is far more fundamental, going to the very question of whether it has any meaningful existence. Here, the conflict has been one between variants of two viewpoints:

(1) the “individual rights” view,³ which has two variants:
   (a) The “standard model,” which sees the Second Amendment as guaranteeing a personal right on a par with other Bill of Rights protections;
   (b) What I have termed the “hybrid” view, which sees it as guaranteeing an individual right, but limited to private bearing of arms suited for military or militia use;⁴ and

(2) the “collective rights” view which likewise has two variants:
   (a) The traditional “collective rights” approach, which sees the Amendment as protecting only a State interest in an organized militia, i.e., National Guard units;⁵ and

What the Fifth Circuit has termed the “sophisticated” collective rights approach, which sees it as protecting individual activity but only if directly linked to organized militia missions.\(^6\)

As the first view treats the Second Amendment as a meaningful restriction on legislative action, while the second treats it as fundamentally meaningless,\(^7\) the conflict is absolute.

The history of the understanding of the American right to arms has followed an unusual course, in which the advantage swayed back and forth between the two schools of thought. At its outset, the existence of an individual right was taken for granted, by courts,\(^8\) commentators,\(^9\) and the general public\(^10\) throughout the 18\(^{th}\) and 19\(^{th}\) centuries. The collective rights view was first enunciated, by a State court, in 1905.\(^11\) In 1939, the United States Supreme Court declined to accept that approach in United States v. Miller;\(^12\) soon thereafter, however, two Circuits read Miller either as endorsing the collective rights approach\(^13\) or as setting only a

After noting that the right to arms must be construed with a view to the militia purpose (with the militia described in colonial terms as the armed community), the Court declined to take judicial notice that such a firearm was suitable for militia use, and remanded. 307 U.S. at 178. This places Miller in the hybrid individual rights camp: an individual may assert the right, but it does not cover weapons suited for brawls rather than militia use. See United States v. Emerson, 270 F.3d at 224-26. The collective rights approach was briefed by the government, as its primary position, but was not adopted by the Court. threshold test that permitted them to go farther and accept such an approach.\textsuperscript{14} Most of the remaining Circuits followed,\textsuperscript{15} and this reading of \textit{Miller} became a matter of “received wisdom,” to the point where some decisions suggest the authors had not bothered to read \textit{Miller} before interpreting it.\textsuperscript{16}

Even as late as the early 1960s, Supreme Court Justices and an article selected by the American Bar Foundation as the winner of its Constitutional Law Essay competition were willing to acknowledge the essentially individual nature of the right protected by the Second Amendment, but that changed by the end of the 1960s.… It is fair to say that by the 1970s the collective or states' rights theory had won the day with most jurists and legal and lay commentators who opined on the issue. Throughout the 1970s and 1980s, expressed opinion on the part of the elite bar, the bench and the legal academy was firmly on the side of those who denied the existence of an individual right to arms.\textsuperscript{17}

The tide was, however, changing once again. When first I published on the subject in 1974,\textsuperscript{18} there were but a few scholarly treatments in print, and none of any particular depth.\textsuperscript{19} Over the next decade, scholarship in the field expanded, largely as a result of the efforts of Stephen Halbrook, the late David Caplan, and Joyce Malcolm.\textsuperscript{20} In 1983, Don Kates published a lengthy breakthrough article in the Michigan Law Review. Thereafter scholarly treatment of the individual rights approach grew exponentially. By the 1990s, the individual rights approach had the endorsement of the major names in constitutional law – William van Alstyne Sanford Levinson, Akhil Amar, Leonard Levy and Laurence Tribe.

It is probably not too much to say that by the 1990s the collective rights view had become intellectually untenable. While judicial acceptance of this trend was still largely withheld, the Fifth Circuit, in United States v. Emerson did take the individual rights approach, creating a deep split among the circuits that stands to this day.

Now into the fray comes Prof. Saul Cornell’s book, A Well Regulated Militia: Founding Fathers and the Origins of Gun Control in America. AWRM rejects the collective rights view, but also rejects a broad reading of the individual rights approach. It advocates what it terms a “civic rights” approach, emphasizing the militia-relatedness of the individual right to arms. It distinguishes this form of individual right from an individual right to arms based on individual self-defense – which, it asserts, evolved out of abolitionist writings of the 1840s and 1850s.\(^{32}\)

AWRM seems uncertain as to the practical ramifications that would follow acceptance of its view. At one point it argues that since militia duties were subject to regulation, so would be any right to arms: “the original civic conception of the Second Amendment emphasizes that there can be no right to bear arms without extensive regulation.”\(^{33}\) Elsewhere, AWRM phrases its conclusion in what are virtually collective-right (or perhaps hybrid-individual right) terms – the purpose of the Second Amendment was to guarantee that “citizens would be able to keep and bear those arms needed to participate in a well-regulated militia.”\(^{34}\)

Professor Cornell’s work is, it must be said, an excellent read, and contains some interesting revelations that have escape earlier authors – not all limited to the right to arms \textit{per se}. A prominent example is its treatment of the evolution of the American legal standard for self-defense, shifting from the common law standard of actual necessity to warding off lethal attack, to the present standard of reasonable \textit{belief} of that necessity.\(^{35}\) Another interesting revelation takes the form of a detailed outline of the Grant Administration’s legal tactics when it set out to prosecute the Ku Klux Klan under the 14\textsuperscript{th} Amendment and the Enforcement Act (the Grant Administration thought prosecutions of local officials for disarmaments of blacks were sure winners).\(^{36}\) Yet another gem involves discovering and documenting the role a 1915 Harvard Law Review article played in promoting the collective rights view, lifting it from its origins in a 1905 Kansas case into a doctrine that found broader judicial acceptance.\(^{37}\) Not to mention AWRM’s discussion of post-Civil War efforts to create black militias, which has received scant attention in recent decades.

As legal history, however, AWRM has a shortcoming, and it goes to its core. AWRM does not prove its thesis, because it gives only a partial, selective, and often unreliable account of the development of the American right to arms. As will be detailed infra, early Americans agreed that they had a right to arms, but in discussing that right, gave different understandings of its purposes and value. Many saw it as enabling a fundamental natural right of self-defense, some saw it as enabling a militia system, and some saw it as ensuring an armed citizenry that (whether enrolled in militia units or not) would serve as a counterbalance to government abuses. The relative balance of these views follows a timeline. Prior to the Revolution, natural rights and self-defense held overwhelmingly dominated the conversation. From 1775 to the framing of the Constitution, when conflict and state-building were the issues of the day, natural rights, militia, and armed people were all in play. By the framing of the Bill of Rights, and in the following decades, natural right and self-defense returned to dominance.

AWRM portrays this historical background as uni-dimensional. It sets out with its conclusion — almost all early Americans before saw the right as militia-centric (at least until the Abolitionists came upon the scene) — and then is forced to make the historical evidence fit.

Often it is a hard fit. At one point, the reader is informed that “Pennsylvania in its Declaration of Rights … affirmed that ‘the people have a right to bear arms for the defense of themselves and the state,’” and on the next page assured that “None of the early state constitutions adopted language protecting an individual right to keep or carry arms for personal self defense.” References to the right as derived from a natural right of self-defense are simply omitted where they are in irreconcilable conflict with the desired conclusion, and recast where the conflict seems explicable. In the process, AWRM too often pushes the historical record, down to making an authority militia-centric by omitting what he said about the Second Amendment and substituting what he said about Article I’s militia clause.

Before detailing AWRM’s difficulties, I would renew an observation I have previously made: there is really no basis for assuming that the Second Amendment had a single objective, for assuming that it must have been meant to protect the militia as a system or to protect an individual right to arms. It has two clauses, after all. Is it likely that the First Congress, when it cut Madison’s proposal for the amendment from 46 to 24 words, would have left in a ten or a fourteen word redundancy? Would it even have retained a preface, given that it struck Madison’s preface to freedom of the press, unless the prefatory and substantial clauses were seen as independent provisos?

Indeed, an inquiry into the language chosen for arms/militia guarantees over the period 1776-1787 showed that the choice originally was seen as either/or, with Classical Republican drafters, strongly focused on creating a stable republic, memorializing the militia, and proto-Jeffersonians, more concerned with individual rights, guaranteeing individual rights to arms. Only in the Virginia ratifying convention of 1788 did the two groups unite, and agree to recognize both the importance of the militia and the right of the people to arms. It is thus critical to recognize that evidence that some Framers spoke of any one purpose is not proof that no other purpose was intended.

In this aspect, both individual rights and collective rights scholars were both partially mistaken, and both partially correct. To make their cases, each was driven to assume that the Framers who spoke of the other view were simply being imprecise or inarticulate. Neither considered the possibility that when Virginia praised the militia, and Pennsylvania guaranteed a right to bear arms of defense of oneself and the state, each meant exactly what they said: they were speaking of somewhat different things.

AWRM marks a break away from the simple “collective rights only” and “individual rights only” dichotomy. At the same time, it tends to fall into a variation of it, advocating what we might term a “civic right only” view, and overlooking the fact that many Framers and their contemporaries did view the right to arms as related to personal self-defense.

Moreover, a closer look at the historical evidence indicates that even “civic right” Framers are divisible into two classes. The first indeed looked to the militia system as a guarantee of freedom. The second spoke of general armament of the people as the primary guarantee. AWRM, in delineating its concept of a civic right to arms, confutes the two. It defines “civic right” in terms of the first, militia-centric, viewpoint. But in arguing for this conclusion, it includes evidence

Rev. 452, 455 (1986) (“The Second Amendment reflects traditional English attitudes toward these three distinct, but intertwined issues: the right of an individual to protect his life, the challenge to the government of an armed citizenry, and the preference for a militia over a standing army.”) 45 See, e.g., AWRM at 14 (“This ancient right was not exercised by individuals acting unilaterally or in isolation, but rather required that citizens act together in concert as part of a relating to the latter view. Thus, when Noah Webster wrote that “Before a standing army can rule, the people must be disarmed; as they are in almost every kingdom of Europe” and that the proposed Constitution was no peril to liberty since “the whole body of the people are armed…” AWRM assures us he meant this as praise of the militia system. But Webster never mentioned the militia system in his pamphlet – his references were to widespread private arms ownership.

The difference is a material one. Part of AWRM’s argument is that if the right to arms is purely militia-related, then fairly extensive government controls would be permissible. If, on the other hand, the Framers saw the right as guaranteeing that an armed populace would keep the government in check, we might turn a much more skeptical eye toward assertions of governmental power. The distinction between the militia-centric viewpoint, and one valuing an armed people, thus goes to the very heart of AWRM’s practical utility as a legal history.

These are aspects of a more fundamental problem in AWRM’s analysis. Dive bomber pilots long ago discovered the dangers of “target fixation,” in which the pilot became so focused upon his target that he noticed nothing else – including the approaching ground. AWRM displays an analogous fixation. It seems at times as if AWRM began with a dogmatic belief that any intelligent Framer must have “civic right only” in mind; thus any writings which seem to vary from this either (a) had civic right in mind but neglected to mention it or (b) can be disregarded because the author was a dunce who failed to grasp what he should have been saying.

Thus when Massachusetts in 1780 guaranteed a right to keep and bear arms “for the common defense,” AWRM sees this as a critical development, “linking a right to keep arms with the obligation to bear them for the common defense,” yet when the First U.S. Senate voted down a similar addition to the Second Amendment, AWRM sees it as a matter of little consequence. The Pennsylvania minority at its ratifying convention demanded a guarantee of a very broad right to arms, that “the people have a right to bear arms for the defense of themselves and their own State, or of the United States, or for the purpose of killing game …”51 AWRM sees the inclusion of hunting as the product of “slapdash draftsmanship.”52 Yet when the New Hampshire ratifiers called for a guarantee that “Congress shall never disarm any Citizen except such as are or have been in Actual Rebellion,”53 AWRM treats the omission of hunting as proof the convention must have been thinking of arms for militia purposes only: “Had New Hampshire sought such a personal right, the state could easily have followed the model proposed by the Pennsylvania dissent and included a provision on hunting.”54 At times we are left to wonder what an 18th century American could have written, said, or done, that AWRM would not read as support of a “civic right only” approach.55

At other points AWRM dons blinders when it encounters evidence of non-militia intent. Previous authors have noted four great legal commentators of the 18th and 19th centuries who discussed the American right to arms: St. George Tucker, William Rawle, Joseph Story, and Thomas Cooley.56 Tucker and Rawle discussed the right to arms as purely individual; Cooley saw it as militia-related but repudiated the claim that it had any limitation to militia duty. Only Story discussed the right to arms purely as militia-related.

This presents a serious problem for AWRM’s thesis, and to deal with it AWRM becomes quite disingenuous. It omits Rawle and Cooley entirely. It praises Tucker but inexplicably omits his discussion of the Second Amendment, and quotes only from his discussion of Article I’s militia clause, which predictably deals with – the militia.57

Part I of this review will examine AWRM’s treatment of the right to arms under the Second Amendment, which exhibits a tendency to stress militia-related writings, to play down other evidence, and to overlook subtle differences in the treatment of rights to arms. Part II will examine its treatment of the commentators and caselaw in the early Republic, in which it shows more serious flaws, down to omitting data which is inconsistent with its thesis, and describing as the majority

I. AWRM’s Treatment of the Background of the Second Amendment.

A. A Problem of Missing Context

Most of AWRM’s treatment of the early period of American law overlaps efforts of prior authors, particularly Stephen Halbrook, Don Kates, and David Kopel. At this point in time, duplication is almost inevitable: after thirty years of industrious digging, there are few nuggets left to be found and, as noted above, where they remain, AWRM does find them. Before examining its treatment of sources from that period, however, it is worthwhile to note the lack of an important context.

AWRM’s focus is upon the development of the American right to arms, and it almost entirely omits treatment of the prior development of a British right to arms. The rights-consciousness of early America grew, of course, from the seed of British concepts, particularly those of the Whig theorists. In 1789, Americans did not invent from thin air the ideas of freedom of the press, freedom from general warrants, rights to jury trial, or a right to arms.

As Joyce Malcolm has extensively documented, the British right to arms arose out of a popular reaction to arms confiscations by the Stuart monarchs, and was enshrined in the 1689 Declaration of Rights, which recognized among the “antient and indubitable rights” of Britons that “the subjects which are protestant may have arms for their defense suitable to their conditions and as allowed by law.” The Parliamentary debates on the Declaration show Members complaining of seizures of private arms, by militia officials, under the 1662 Militia Act, and that the House of Lords struck “for the common defense” from the end of the provision. The English right, as recognized in the Declaration, had no militia 58 At first glance, I thought AWRM had made a major discovery: James Madison had used “bear arms” in drafting a bill regulating hunting, i.e., in a non-military context. AWRM at 29. But Stephen Halbrook had found this, too. See Stephen P. Halbrook, supra note 22, at 223 n. 145.

orientation – if anything, it had an anti-militia slant, denouncing the acts of militia leaders, which had been authorized under militia statutes. Indeed, one British military historian has complained, “The revised wording suggested only that it was lawful to keep a blunderbuss to repel burglars.”

Blackstone’s authoritative treatment of English law cited the Declaration and classed its right to arms as an auxiliary right that protected the subject against a day when the failure of legal protections made either resistance, or self defense, essential – in short, as a broad principle of self-defense, with no reference to militia service:

THE fifth and last auxiliary right of the subject, that I shall at present mention, is that of having arms for their defence, suitable to their condition and degree, and such as are allowed by law. Which is also declared by the same statute 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2. and is indeed a public allowance, under due restrictions, of the natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression.

In this, Blackstone harkens back to Thomas Hobbes, who had made the right of self-defense the one inalienable right, precisely because the subject had submitted to the sovereign in exchange for protection against private violence: the subject could not bargain away the one thing he had received in the exchange.

AWRM virtually omits the English experience, devoting but three sentences to the Declaration – and at that, quoting the relevant sentence only in part -- Blackstone considered the absolute rights of Englishmen to be personal security, personal liberty, and private property. These were backed by “auxiliary subordinate rights of the subject, which serve principally as barriers to protect and maintain inviolate the three great and primary rights.” The auxiliary rights were the powers given Parliament, the limitations on the royal prerogative, the right to seek judicial remedy, the right to petition, and the right to arms. 68 AWRM at 12.

69 AWRM states that early colonists believed they had a right to “have arms for their defenses,” based on the Declaration. It then quotes the Declaration proviso as “the subjects being protestant may have arms for their defense,” omitting the “suitable to their conditions” proviso – which before assuring the reader that early Bostonians put a militia gloss upon the right to arms by noting it was well-suited for defense of the community. Of Blackstone, we are told little more than that he must have thought the Declaration of Rights and self defense were distinct, since he writes of self-defense separately (which is neither correct – he discusses the right of self defense in the same chapter as the right to arms – nor dispositive – he discusses the legal elements of self defense elsewhere, but does the same with the importance of the militia) and that, since Blackstone also treated the right to petition as an auxiliary right, both rights must be “essentially political.” (We may note that this implies the right of association is also “essentially political”). Blackstone’s reference to “self-preservation” as the purpose of the right goes by the wayside.

In short, the Anglo-American concept of the right saw it as related to self-defense, which in turn had two aspects: individual self-defense against criminals, and collective self-defense against a tyrannical government. Both were outgrowths of a fundamental right to self-defense, and both were, to Blackstone, defenses against “oppression.” By focusing only upon the American experience, AWRM overlooks its underpinnings as an auxiliary of self-defense.

A more careful attention to Blackstone and to the British legal authorities might have prevented some errors from creeping into AWRM. We are told, for instance, that “Under British law one could not travel armed, and the mere possession of arms likely to provoke a public panic was also punishable.” In fact, while there had been a 1328 statute forbidding riding while armed, it appears to have been universally ignored, and when James II prosecuted a political enemy for emphasizes the personal nature of the right. It then quotes Sam Adam’s discussion of Blackstone. AWRM at 12-14.

As I point out infra, Adams’ discussion sounds as if it refers to political resistance, but it actually referred to individual defense against street criminals who happened to be enlisted in the British army.

Blackstone extensively discusses self-defense as one of the “principle absolute rights,” in Book I, chapter 1. Indeed it is the first aspect of personal security, which in turn is the first right discussed. Later in Book I, chapter 1 he discusses the right to arms as an “auxiliary right,” one of those meant to safeguard the absolute rights. He discusses the militia in Book I, chapter 14, and self-defense as a criminal defense in Book IV, chapter 14.

In Book IV, chapter 15, the commentator notes that “all kinds of crimes of a public nature, all disturbances of the peace, all oppressions, and other misdemeanors whatsoever” are indictable. (Emphasis supplied).

taking weapons into a church in 1687, King’s Bench acquitted him, noting “a general connivance to gentlemen to ride armed for their security,” and adding that the law was only meant to forbid going armed with intent “to terrify the King’s subjects.”

Along the same lines, the power of authorities to disarm those involved in an “affray” is treated in AWRM as if it were broad power, with the note a hunting party would not “in most circumstances” constitute an affray. A reference to Blackstone would have shown that an affray was “the fighting of two or more persons in some public place, to the terror of his Majesty's subjects,” distinguished from ordinary assault by the causing of public terror, and from riot by the small number of individuals involved.

B. AWRM’s Treatment of American Revolutionary Thought

If the English right to arms had two aspects, self-defense against criminals and collective resistance against tyranny, it is not surprising that in the period surrounding the American Revolution, the focus of political writers and speakers was largely upon the second aspect. General Gage had raided militia supplies at Concord, and Governor Dunmore had seized the gunpowder at Williamsburg, to prevent organized resistance, not in hopes of freeing colonial burglars from occupational hazards. Antifederalists during the ratification debates would have been laughed down if they had argued Congress might use its newfound powers to protect street criminals, but could make headway with complaints about powers given Congress over the militia. AWRM makes much of the comparative silence of political speakers as to self-defense against criminals, but viewed in historical context this remains an understandable omission, not a repudiation.

80 Indeed, given the nature of commerce at the time, it would have been hard to formulate an argument that the Constitution gave Congress a power to regulate arms making and possession.
Muskets were made by local gunsmiths and blacksmiths, and Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111 (1942), was far in the future. The militia clauses, however, gave Congress the power to prescribe militia organization, arms, and drill, and to call the militia out for specified purposes.
Nor are the historical actors entirely silent on that topic, and here AWRM seems to play down or recast their words to make them fit a “civic rights only” mold.

1. The early colonists’ public writings.

Sam Adams and his fellow Bostonian writers, AWRM states, viewed the right to arms as a civic, militia, affair. Of Adams’ invocation of Blackstone, we are told, “This ancient right [of resistance and self-preservation] was not exercised by individuals acting unilaterally or in isolation, but required that citizens act together in concert, as part of a well-regulated militia.”

The historical context of Adams’ writings is more complex. It must be understood that 18th century recruiting practices were directed at finding, not a few good men, but a lot of bad ones, and jails were a good source of recruits.

In 1768, several thousand British troops were dispatched to Boston, where they were quartered among the population. The city essentially experienced a stunning increase in its population of street criminals; brawls, robberies, and rapes became a frequent occurrence. A British officer’s diary reflects the state of affairs:

Nothing remarkable but the drunkenness among the Soldiers, which is now got to a very great pitch; owing to the cheapness of the liquor….

Last night there was a Riot in King Street, in consequence of an Officer seen having been insulted by the Watchmen which has frequently happen'd, as those people suppose from their employment that they may do it with impunity; the contrary, however, they experienc'd last night: several Officers drew their Swords and … one of the Watch lost a Nose, another a Thumb, besides many others by the points of Swords….

[H]eard of some robberies committed in the Country, most probably by some of the Deserters, who will do more harm than good, as nothing but Rascals go off; serve the Yankys right for enticinn them away.

Viewed in its entirety, Adams’ 1769 article is referring, to defense, not against the official acts of the redcoats, but against their off-duty street criminality:

Instances of the licentious and outrageous behavior of the military conservators of the peace still multiply upon us, some of which are of such nature, and have been carried to such lengths, as must serve fully to evince that a late vote of this town, calling upon its inhabitants to provide themselves with arms for their defense, was a measure as prudent as it was legal: such violences are always to be apprehended from military troops, when quartered in the body of a populous city; but more especially so, when they are led to believe that they are become necessary to awe a spirit of rebellion, injuriously said to be existing therein. It is a natural right which the people have reserved to themselves, confirmed by the Bill of Rights, to keep arms for their own defence; and as Mr. Blackstone observes, it is to be made use of when the sanctions of society and law are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression.\textsuperscript{84}

As if to underscore Adam’s point, the next day’s issue of the newspaper reported that two women had been attacked by soldiers, and that a posstrider had been assaulted by a pair of officers.\textsuperscript{85} AWRM thus errs by treating Adams’ invocations of Blackstone as militia-related. Put in context, Adams is not in 1768 calling upon Bostonians to rise up in political rebellion against the redcoats, but rather justifying their taking up arms in self-defense against street criminals who happened to be off-duty soldiers.

2. The Early State Declarations of Rights.

i. Virginia, 1776

The first part of the Second Amendment derives from an abbreviated form of Virginia’s 1776 Declaration of Rights, which stressed the militia: "A well-regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state."\textsuperscript{86}

This clearly fits a “civic right” or militia-centric approach, and it is not surprising that AWRM extensively discusses this proviso. AWRM also notes that Thomas Jefferson unsuccessfully proposed an individual right – “"No freeman shall ever be debarred the use of arms" -- which he later revised by adding, or at least considering adding, “within his own lands or tenaments.” AWRM treats the addition as a significant retreat, “effectively eliminating the right to carry arms.” An equally likely explanation is that the Virginia gentry were constantly trying to stop poaching of game on their own domains, and “use” of arms on others’ land would have protected illegal hunting.

But let us break away from “collective right only,” “individual right only,” and “civic right only” approaches for a moment. What is most significant of the Virginia Declaration and of Jefferson’s failed proposal is that, taken together, they illustrate that some early statesmen sought a guarantee of a broad individual right, whereas others sought to protect the militia as an institution. In the gentry-dominated politics of revolutionary Virginia, the latter prevailed, and their product would later become the model for half, but only half, of the Second Amendment. The model for the other half came was not long delayed.

ii. Pennsylvania, 1776.

The second half of the Amendment derives from a different political act by what were, in a literal sense, radically different political actors. Pennsylvania’s consent to independence had been secured by a dramatic political purge of the pro-British merchant class and the anti-war Quakers. The political context thus differed greatly from that of Virginia: Pennsylvania’s merchant gentry had been overthrown.

Pennsylvania adopted a Declaration of Rights which John Adams described as taken “almost verbatim from that of Virginia.” “Almost” is an important qualifier, since the Pennsylvanians made two relevant changes. First, they deleted the Virginia praise of the militia, and substituted an individual right to arms: “That the people have a right to bear arms for the defence of themselves and the state…”

87 The phrase is bracketed, making it unclear whether Jefferson originally included it, then debated taking it out, or later debated its inclusion. 1 Papers of Thomas Jefferson 344 (J. Boyd, ed. 1950).

89 For Washington’s efforts against poaching, see 37 Writings of George Washington 194 (J. Fitzpatrick, ed. 1940).
90 David T. Hardy, supra note 41, at 36-38.
Second, they underscored the change by inserting a preamble. The Virginia Declaration of Rights’ first clause, essentially a preamble, had mentioned the retention of certain rights – enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, and pursuit of “happiness and safety.”93 To the list the Pennsylvanians added “enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing and protecting property…”94 “Defending life” and “protecting property” have clearly individual, non-militia, connotations.

The combination of the preamble and a right to arms for self-defense would seem fairly convincing evidence that the Pennsylvania delegates were concerned with personal use of arms, and specifically for self-defense. If they had been concerned solely with the militia, they could have retained the Virginia language, as they did with other rights.

AWRM, however, does its best to explain how the Pennsylvanians really were thinking about the militia, not about self-defense, even as they wrote about self-defense and clipped out reference to the militia.

AWRM notes that thirteen years before, Pennsylvania had experienced the Paxton Boy’s Uprising, in which a group of frontiersmen massacred a score of Conestoga Indians. AWRM points out that one pamphlet defending their actions had referred to the lack of a militia law and used wording that “anticipated the language eventually included by the Pennsylvanians in their Declaration of Rights.”95 AWRM concludes that the Pennsylvanians must have meant to safeguard the militia as an institution when they used the same term: “The language eventually incorporated into the Pennsylvania Declaration of Rights reflected this bitter struggle over public safety, and had little to do with public concern over an individual right to keep arms for self-protection.”96

An examination of the pamphlet does little to suggest that its authors’ language was appropriated by the Pennsylvania delegates. The relevant part complains of the indifference of the state legislature:

When we applied to the Government for Relief, the far greater part of the Assembly were Quakers, some of whom made light of our Sufferings and plead Conscience, so that they could neither take Arms in Defense of themselves or their County, nor form a Militia Law to oblige the inhabitants to arms, nor even grant the King any money to enable his loyal Subjects in the Province to reduce the common Enemy. 97

The occurrence of “Defense of themselves or their County” in the midst of a rather obscure 98 1764 discussion of Quaker beliefs is not much evidence that the 1776 convention’s “the people have a right to bear arms for the defence of themselves and the state” was based on borrowed language, or that the 1776 authors had the Paxton Boys in mind when they wrote. Moreover, the pamphleteer draws a distinction between the Quakers not taking up arms themselves, their failure to enact a militia law, and (in a part omitted by AWRM) their refusal to send money to help the frontiersmen defend themselves. The complaint is that they would neither take up arms voluntarily, nor form a mandatory militia, nor help individuals defend themselves (absent a mandatory militia system).

iii. Massachusetts, 1780

The Massachusetts Declaration of Rights was based on the Pennsylvania model, with two changes. First, it added “keep” arms, to the right to “bear” them, and second it added “for the common defense” at the end: “The people have a right to keep and bear arms for the common defense.” 99 The first addition broadened the right, the second restricted it. The restriction is consistent with its principal draftsman’s fear of mob rule. 100

AWRM notes that the “for the common defense” language met opposition in town assemblies, where fears were expressed that it might allow enactment of laws requiring public storage of arms, but that these protests did not lead to a change in the language. 101 Again, this suggests that there was no single conception of the right to arms at the time. The Massachusetts’ drafters may have had a militia-

100 John Adams would later write that “To suppose arms in the hands of citizens, to be used at individual discretion, except in cases of private self-defense, or by partial orders of town, counties, or districts of a state, is to demolish every constitution...” 6 Works of John Adams, Second President of the U.S. 197 (Charles Adams ed. 1851). It is noteworthy that even Adams listed both self-defense and militia functions as proper objects of the right to arms.

centric view of the right, but the town assemblies had a broader view. The difference is all the more important since the First Senate, nine years later, considered a motion to insert “for the common defense” in the Second Amendment – and voted it down.102

In its conclusion for this segment, AWRM again drifts toward an all too narrow “single purpose only” view of the right to arms. We are told that the “civic conception” of the right to arms, related to militia service, was the “dominant model” of the period.103 This is probably not inaccurate: if we class the Virginia model as quite civic, the Pennsylvania one as quite individual, and the Massachusetts one as somewhere in between, but tending more toward the civic concept, the civic concept would have a modest advantage. A fuller comparison would show the vote-count swaying back and forth over this period.104 But the critical consideration is that different groups of Americans were taking two different approaches, and decades later the First Congress would have to satisfy two constituencies.

C. AWRM’s Treatment of the Constitution and the Ratifying Debates.

Following the end of the Revolution, it became apparent that the Articles of Confederation conferred too little power upon the national establishment, and the Continental Congress authorized a convention to draft amendments to the Articles. When the convention decided instead to propose an entirely new Constitution, members of the State conventions called to ratify the proposal quickly divided into what would later become known as the federalist and antifederalist camps. The first ratifications were obtained before the antifederalists could muster much support, but opposition organized quickly thereafter.

The antifederalists soon found a winning argument in the document’s lack of a bill of rights. Some went beyond mere criticism, and advanced their own proposals for such an addition, thus leaving us with rather specific ideas of what each person or body desired. The great majority of these appear focused on an individual right to arms for individual purposes, with the remainder invoking both... individual rights and civic purposes. No proposal from this period gave protection of the militia as the sole purpose of a right to arms, and the majority did not even mention the militia.

Here AWRM seems to give emphasis to the proposals which can be recast to at least be consistent with a civic or militia concept, and to omit, or play down, those where such recasting would be hopeless. We will take these in chronological order.

Samuel Adams, Massachusetts. Adams unsuccessfully proposed a bill of rights that included “that the said constitution be never construed to infringe the just liberty of the press or the rights of conscience; or to prevent the people of the United States who are peaceable citizens from keeping their own arms….,” an individual reference. 105 This would seem a clear indication that certain antifederalists were pressing for an individual right, for individual purposes. Although acknowledging Adams as a prominent antifederalist author, 106 AWRM makes no mention of his proposal.

The Pennsylvania Minority Report. In Pennsylvania, antifederalists formed a large minority of the delegates, and proposed a right to arms. After the convention ratified without a bill of rights, the minority issued a report on their demands, which was circulated in other States. 107 The Pennsylvania minority called for:

That the people have a right to bear arms for the defense of themselves and their own State, or of the United States, or for the purpose of killing game; and no law shall be passed for disarming the people or any of them, unless for crimes committed, or real danger of public injury from individuals… 108

The Pennsylvania minority report is as clear a statement of individual right for individual purposes as could be imagined, and stands as a powerful objection to a “civic right only” approach to the right to arms. AWRM acknowledges the Pennsylvania proposal, but treats it as inconsequential: it showed “slapdash draftsmanship,” no other proposals used “bear arms” in relation to nonmilitary usages (although AWRM acknowledges, earlier, that James Madison himself did so\textsuperscript{109}), and the federalists did not respond to the relevant passages.\textsuperscript{110} But a critique of the Minority’s drafting skill is not a disproof that a growing number of antifederalists (here, over a third of the convention) wanted to see a guarantee of an individual right for individual purposes, and that a “civic rights only” explanation is inadequate.

The New Hampshire Majority. New Hampshire gave the Constitution the ninth ratification it needed before it bound the States already signatory to it. In this convention the proponents of a bill of rights achieved a majority, and Federalists found they could live with such a proposal -- so long as it was not a condition of ratification. Its ratification thus has a certain unique importance. The New Hampshire convention called for a guarantee that "Congress shall never disarm any Citizen except such as are or have been in Actual Rebellion,"\textsuperscript{111} again a clearly individual right (down to an exception for individuals in rebellion), this time demanded by a majority of a ratifying convention.

AWRM omits the New Hampshire proposal from its discussion of the ratifying convention’s proposals, then mentions it, in passing, while discussing Madison’s later drafting of the Bill of Rights. There, AWRM assures us that since New Hampshire did not mention hunting, “the primary purpose was federalism, not a right to protect the use of guns for private purposes.”\textsuperscript{112} Apparently, any Framer or convention which did not mention a constitutional right to hunt is to be classed as a proponent of the “civic rights only” approach. One is left wondering what is unclear about "Congress shall never disarm any Citizen except such as are or have been in Actual Rebellion.”

Virginia. Virginia’s convention followed the New Hampshire approach, and ratified with a request for a bill of rights. When it came to the issue of arms, the drafters made a conceptual breakthrough. There was no need to choose between satisfying those who wanted to secure the militia, and those who wanted to guarantee an individual right to arms: they could placate both. Going back to the State declarations of rights the Virginians:

a. Began with the Pennsylvania/Massachusetts State constitutions’ declaration of a “right of the people;”

b. retained Massachusetts’ addition of a right to keep arms, but deleted its “common defense” limitation; then

c. Attached their own Declaration of Rights referring to the importance of a well regulated militia.

In so doing, they recognized both the militia concept and the individual rights concept, and in the broadest terms used to date for each:

that the people have the right to keep and bear arms; that a well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people trained to arms, is the proper, natural and safe defence of a free state ....

The Virginia language stands as a prominent reminder that some Americans wanted an individual right for individual purposes, and others wanted a protection of the militia as a system, and drafters of a bill of rights had to satisfy two schools of thought. George Mason’s speech to the convention shows that he was reaching out to both groups, suggesting that neglect of the militia was a means to a worse end, disarmament of the people:

Forty years ago, when the resolution of enslaving America was formed in Great Britain, the British parliament was advised by an artful man, who was governor of Pennsylvania, to disarm the people--that was the best and most effectual way to enslave them--but that they should not do it openly; but to weaken them and let them sink gradually, by totally disusing and neglecting the militia.

Paradoxically, while extensively discussing the debates in the Virginia Convention, AWRM does not quote, nor paraphrase, the language that resulted. We are simply assured that “all of the provisions suggested by the Virginia Convention focused on the militia.”

New York. The New York debates on ratification provide our fullest written record relating to arms and the militia. This was in good part because, as AWRM notes, the federalists realized they were now at a disadvantage, and were forced to counterattack.

The most noteworthy defense was, of course, the Federalist Papers, and AWRM rightly gives these extensive treatment, albeit one with emphasis on a civic right understanding. Hamilton, in Federalist 29, indeed criticizes reliance upon the general militia which, he contends, could never be sufficiently trained. “Little more can reasonably be aimed at, with respect to the people at large, than to have them properly armed and equipped…” Hamilton’s purpose was to demonstrate that a standing army was necessary, and the militia insufficient, rather than to flesh out a right to arms or to laud the militia.

The same cannot be said of James Madison’s Federalist 46. Madison indeed discusses the right to arms in a civic context, although a careful reading shows he recognizes a distinction between civic in the sense of an organized militia, and civic in the sense of an armed populace.

Madison begins by calculating that the new republic could not afford an army of more than 30,000 men, who would be counterbalanced by 500,000 militiamen. Here speaks in terms of an organized, State-officered militia system. Then, however, he depicts the underlying safeguard as involving widespread civilian armament, improved and made more powerful by organization of a militia:

Besides the advantage of being armed, which the Americans possess over the people of almost every other nation, the existence of subordinate governments, to which the people are attached, and by which the militia officers are appointed, forms a barrier against the enterprises of ambition…

Madison later returns to the theme, pointing out that despite their armies European monarchs “are afraid to trust the people with arms.” It is clear that “the people with arms” relates to widespread civilian arms ownership, because Madison continues on to suggest that in the American context the militia system, and State governments, make this even more effective:

And it is not certain, that with this aid alone they would not be able to shake off their yokes. But were the people to possess the additional advantages of local governments chosen by themselves, … and of officers appointed out of the militia, by these governments, and attached both to them and to the militia, it may be affirmed with the greatest assurance, that the throne of every tyranny in Europe would be speedily overturned in spite of the legions which surround it.

118 Alexander Hamilton, Federalist No. 29.
Madison, in short, is describing a “civic purpose,” but one with a dual basis: tyranny might be prevented by an armed populace, but a militia organization will render the protection ironclad. AWRM mentions this duality, but in the end assembles it into a single concept: “The existence of a well-armed population organized into state militias guaranteed that American would never succumb to tyranny.”

The Federalist Papers were not the only component of the written debates. Noah Webster, the future lexicographer, had earlier contributed his Examination into the Leading Principles of the Federal Constitution. AWRM fairly quotes the relevant passage:

Before a standing army can rule, the people must be disarmed; as they are in almost every kingdom of Europe. The supreme power in America cannot enforce unjust laws by the sword; because the whole body of the people are armed, and constitute a force superior to any bands of regular troops that can be, on any pretence, raised in the United States.

AWRM then, however, interprets this as militia-related: “It was precisely because the militia was such a central institution in American life that Americans had little to fear from a standing army.” Webster, however, said nothing of the militia system; his references are to the universal armament of the American population.

In short, throughout the ratification period, discussions of a right to arms took the form either of (a) references to a purely individual right or its equivalent, a mandate that Congress never disarm ordinary individuals, or (b) references both to the importance of individual arms ownership and importance of the militia. AWRM omits most of the first, and recasts the second into pure militia-centric references.

D. AWRM’s Treatment of the Drafting and Congressional Passage of the Bill of Rights.

AWRM quotes Madison’s proposal as introduced in the First Congress:

The right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed; a well armed, and well regulated militia being the best security of a free country; but no person religiously scrupulous of bearing arms, shall be compelled to render military service in person.

AWRM then notes that the First House reversed the order of the arms and militia clauses. This, AWRM contends, “had enormous constitutional significance,” since the militia clause was now a preface to the right to arms, and hence the right to arms must be construed in light of it.

One might equally well make the opposite argument: the right to arms was now the substantive guarantee, and recognition of the militia merely an explanatory preface. A better understanding – given that the First House trimmed out Madison’s other prefatory clauses – is that, as in the First Amendment, each clause had independent significance. If the Virginians, Madison, or the First Congress were concerned only about the militia, they would have stopped with “A well regulated militia [is] necessary to the security of a free state.”

Of the actual proceedings in the First Congress, we have sparse records. There are reports of the House debates, but these were compiled, decades later, from newspaper reports of the proceedings. The First Senate met in executive session, but kept a journal of motions and votes. AWRM correctly notes that reports of the House debates deal largely with Elbridge Gerry’s concerns about the militia, and conscientious objection, which seem to have been laughed off by the remainder of the House. We do have Madison’s notes for his speech introducing the proposal, which suggests that he saw it as paralleling the English Declaration of Rights and its individual guarantee (the notes, in a section devoted to the inadequacies of the 1688 Declaration, show “arms to protts,” presumably meaning that it was inadequate because it guaranteed only Protestant subjects the right to arms.\textsuperscript{129} AWRM makes no mention of Madison’s notes.

In First Senate, the Journal does show a significant legislative decision. A motion was made to add “for the common defense” to the right to arms, and voted down.\textsuperscript{130} AWRM makes much of the Massachusetts decision to include this language: it “forged a tight link between the two [arms bearing and militia service]. A single constitutional principle emerged, linking a right to keep arms with the obligation to bear them for the common defense.”\textsuperscript{131} The Senate’s rejection of the same proposal would, by AWRM’s logic, suggest that the First Congress meant to ensure that the two were not linked.

AWRM attempts to explain away the Senate vote, but the explanation approaches the incomprehensible: if inserted into the Amendment, it might “have provided unscrupulous leaders with a pretext for prohibiting the militia from defending the states or localities from internal or external threats.”\textsuperscript{132} AWRM makes no attempt to demonstrate that anyone, then or at anytime prior to the publication of AWRM, saw the language as posing that threat. The insertion of identical text in the Massachusetts Bill of Rights had engendered controversy – but not on this theme, rather on the belief that it might give the government the power to control private arms.\textsuperscript{133} Once again, a very large shoehorn is used to make individual rights evidence fit the civic rights only constraint.\textsuperscript{134}

Finally, we have the one contemporary explanation of the meaning of the Second Amendment, an explanation available both to Madison and to the First Congress, and for which Madison thanked the author.\textsuperscript{135} Federalist writer Tench Coxe, a friend of Madison, published in the Federal Gazette and Philadelphia Evening Post a clause-by-cause explanation of Madison’s draft. He treated the right to arms as an individual right: since governments and armies might be tempted to abuse power, “the people are confirmed by the next article in their right to keep and bear their private arms.”

Coxe’s article is difficult to reconcile with AWRM’s approach, so it attempts to minimize it. It was “slapdash” (citing Coxe’s self-deprecating remark that he had dashed it off, and not referencing his comment that “I have given them a very careful perusal.”). It was “not widely reprinted.” (That Madison wrote back to say “I find it in all the Gazettes here,” i.e., in New York, where the First Congress was meeting, should settle the sufficiency of its impact, even without Stephen Halbrook’s discovery that it was also reprinted in Boston). It “prompted no commentary by contemporaries,” proving it was insignificant (or that it was taken as indisputable). Coxe deserves better. His article has a unique relevance to original understanding: it analyzed the Bill of Rights clause by clause, is known to have been reprinted in the three of the four largest American cities, and has Madison himself attesting that it was well-known to the First Congress. It is hard to see why AWRM seeks to dismiss his work.

II. AWRM’s Coverage of Post-Ratification Treatment of the Right to Arms.

Early American thought on the right to arms comes largely from two sources: legal commentaries and caselaw. Most of these sources indicate that the right to arms was viewed as an individual right for individual purposes, or as an individual right both supporting the militia institution and also for individual purposes such as self defense. AWMR here downplays the majority view or revises it in rather dubious fashion.

AWRM treats this earlier writing as authoritative and proof that Coxe did not think arms use for individual purposes was a serious issue. AWRM at 52-53, 63. When Coxe speaks of arms bearing for the militia, he is treated as an authority; when he speaks of arms bearing for self-defense he is marginalized.

No one has, to my knowledge, undertaken a study of the article’s coverage in all early newspapers, but its having made the press in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia is certainly suggestive that it was widely covered. It appears to have been the only section-by-section analysis of the Bill of Rights printed in the contemporary press.
142 AWRM at 63.
In the period after the framing, several prominent legal scholars published texts that were authoritative in their time and which discuss the Second Amendment at varying lengths. AWRM tends to emphasize those which placed emphasis on the militia, or organized resistance as a deterrent to tyranny, and to omit or play down those which emphasized individual self-defense. We will take these treatises in chronological order.

St. George Tucker’s Blackstone. St. George Tucker was a law professor at the College of William and Mary, later appointed to the Virginia Supreme Court by Thomas Jefferson and to its federal district bench by James Madison. His brother served in the First Senate, and his closest friend in the First House.\(^143\) In 1803, he published the first American edition of Blackstone’s Commentaries,\(^144\) which remained for a quarter of a century the treatise most frequently cited by the United States Supreme Court.\(^145\)

Tucker’s Blackstone poses quite a problem for a “civic rights only” theory of the Second Amendment (which Tucker lists as the Fourth Amendment).\(^146\) Tucker cites Blackstone’s listing of the fifth auxiliary right, “of having arms suitable to their condition and degree and such as are allowed by law," and drops a footnote on the American equivalent: “The right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed. Amendments to C., U.S., art. 4, and this without any qualification to their condition or degree, as is the case in the British government.”\(^147\) This plainly tied the Second Amendment to the English right to arms, which was seen as linked to self defense rather than to militia functions, and stresses that the American right is broader than the English one.\(^148\) Then, in his appendix on American law, Tucker elaborates:

> The right of self defense is the first law of nature; in most governments it has been the study of rulers to confine this right within the narrowest limits possible. Whenever standing armies are kept up, and the right of the people to keep and bear arms is, under any color or pretext whatsoever, prohibited, liberty, if not already annihilated, is on the brink of destruction. In England, the people have been disarmed, generally under the specious pretext of preserving the game; a never-failing lure to bring over the landed aristocracy to support any measure .... True it is, their Bill of Rights seems at first view to counteract this policy; but their right of bearing arms is confined to Protestants, and the words "suitable to their condition or degree" have been interpreted to authorize the prohibition of keeping a gun or other engine for the destruction of game, to any farmer, or inferior tradesman, or other person not qualified to kill game.\textsuperscript{149}

Tucker’s footnote suggests an “individual right for individual purposes” view, and his appendix suggests an “individual right both for individual and for civic purposes” approach, with the former predominating; the latter also makes clear that, whatever the source of the right, Tucker repudiates laws that prohibit some citizens from “keeping” guns.

A decade ago, David Kopel noted that “none of the anti-individual [rights] writers even admit Tucker’s existence, let alone attempt to address the meaning of the most important law book of the Early Republic.”\textsuperscript{150} How AWRM rises to the challenge is thus of exceptional interest.

AWRM’s treatment of Tucker is peculiar, to say the least. AWRM begins by acknowledging Tucker’s importance, and citing his unpublished lecture notes, which (unlike his Blackstone) often mention the militia.\textsuperscript{151}

Nearly thirty pages later, it returns to Tucker in a section entitled “An American Blackstone Ponders the Second Amendment.”\textsuperscript{152} Here it refers to his Blackstone, acknowledging that “Tucker dealt with the Second Amendment in several places in his monumental treatise.”\textsuperscript{153}

AWRM informs us that these included a “denunciation of Federalist use of volunteer militias…,” an interpretation of the Second Amendment as “a strong affirmation of state’s rights,” an argument for judicial enforcement of the Second

\textsuperscript{149} St. George Tucker, \textit{supra} note 143, at 300. Tucker was incorrect as to the prohibition on arms ownership by those not entitled to hunt. Amendment, and relation of “his fears about potential federal disarmament of the militia.”

The treatment was a bit astonishing; as noted above, Tucker’s Blackstone deals with an individual right rising out of the right of self-defense. AWRM had not a word on this.

A glance at the endnotes showed that the citations are from Tucker’s View of the Constitution, a set of essays that were appended as a supplement to his great treatise. An examination of the View of the Constitution uncovered several serious deficiencies in AWRM’s treatment of that work.

First, Tucker is here attempting a survey of both the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. The militia references cited by AWRM come in Tucker’s discussion of the Constitution’s militia clause. It is hardly surprising that in discussing the militia clause, Tucker discusses the militia.

Second, in his View of the Constitution Tucker does have a section on the Second Amendment. Here, Tucker becomes repeats the individualistic treatment given the right in his Blackstone, and adds that the right is the very palladium of liberty.

A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep, and bear arms, shall not be infringed.

Amendments to C.U.S. Art. 4.

8. This may be considered as the true palladium of liberty. The right of self defense is the first law of nature: in most governments it has been the study of rulers to confine this right within the narrowest limits possible. Wherever standing armies are kept up, and the right of the people to keep and bear arms is, under any color or pretext whatsoever, prohibited, liberty, if not already annihilated, is on the brink of destruction. In England, the people have been disarmed, generally, under the specious pretext of preserving the game: a never failing lure to bring over the landed aristocracy to support any measure, under that mask, though calculated for very different purposes. True it is, their bill of rights seems at first view to counteract this policy: but the right of bearing arms is confined to protestants, and the words suitable to their condition and degree, have been interpreted to authorize the prohibition of keeping a gun or other engine for the destruction of game, to any farmer, or inferior tradesman, or other person not qualified to kill game. So that not one man in five hundred can keep a gun in his house without being subject to a penalty.\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 100. Tucker refers to the 2\textsuperscript{nd} Amendment as “Art. 4” because the Bill of Rights proposed by Congress contained twelve articles, the first two of which were not ratified by the States. In 1803, it was still possible that the first two might yet be ratified.}

AWRM entirely omits this, the most relevant, passage. Third, AWRM cites Tucker as allowing for judicial enforcement of the right, as a challenge to the “Federalist theory of loose construction of the Constitution.” This is correct, but Tucker’s words clearly tie in an individual view of the right to arms:

If, for example, a law be passed by congress, prohibiting the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates, or persuasions of a man’s own conscience; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people to assemble peaceably, or to keep and bear arms; it would, in any of these cases, be the province of the judiciary to pronounce whether any such act were constitutional, or not; and if not, to acquit the accused from any penalty which might be annexed to the breach of such unconstitutional act.\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 120.}

AWRM’s conversion of the clearly individualist Tucker into a militia-focused commentator requires omitting everything he did say about the Second Amendment, and substituting what he said about Article I’s militia clause. This is sleight of hand, not a fair reading of authority.

William Rawle’s \textit{View of the Constitution}. In 1825 William Rawle published his \textit{A View of the Constitution}. Like Tucker, Rawle would have had an exceptional insight into the original understanding of the Bill of Rights, since he sat in the Pennsylvania legislature when it ratified it.\footnote{Edward Bauer, Commentaries on the Constitution 1790-1960 at 61 (1995).} His book was widely used as a constitutional law teaching tool in early American law schools.\footnote{David Brown, Eulogium Upon William Rawle 38 (Philadelphia 1837).}

Also like Tucker, Rawle poses a major barrier to a “civic rights only” approach. His text made clear that he saw the militia portion and the right to arms portions of the Second Amendment as independent legal mandates. He first discussed the importance of the militia (while conceding that regular troops were often more valuable), and then treated the individual right to arms as a separate, related, restriction on governmental power:

The corollary from the first position is that the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed. The prohibition is general. No clause in the Constitution could by any rule of construction be conceived to give to Congress a power to disarm the people. Such a flagitious attempt could only be made under some general pretence by a state legislature. But if in some blind pursuit of inordinate power, either should attempt it, this amendment may be appealed to as a restraint on both.\(^{161}\)

It is simply impossible to make Rawle fit a “civic rights only” box, unless it is one very large container. AWRM simply omits any mention of Rawle’s work.\(^{162}\) It is hard to justify the omission. Rawle was not only a respected constitutional authority, he was the only early commentator who actually voted to ratify the Bill of Rights.

Justice Story’s Commentaries on the Constitution. In 1833, Justice Joseph Story published his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States\(^{163}\). Story did discuss the right to arms in terms of organized resistance to government oppression, informing his readers that tyrants seek their goals by “disarming the people, and making it an offense to keep arms, and substituting a regular army in stead of resort to the militia.”\(^{164}\) Story’s discussion fits “civic rights,” if not necessarily “militia-centric only.”\(^{165}\) Story is accordingly given treatment in AWRM.\(^{166}\)

Thomas Cooley’s General Principles of Constitutional Law. Thomas Cooley was the most renowned American legal authority of his age. In 1858 he became the first \(^{161}\) W. Rawle, A View of the Constitution 126 (Philadelphia, 2d ed. 1829). The idea of appealing to a Federal bill of rights provision in a case brought under State law may seem strange to our eyes. But in the natural rights theory that then prevailed, written guarantees were memorials of a right, and a guarantee as against one government could easily be seen at least as evidence that the right existed as to the other. In fact, the Second Amendment was later invoked, by a State court, to strike down a State law, in Nunn v. State, 1 Ga. 243 (1846).

professor at the University of Michigan School of Law, and later sat on the Michigan Supreme Court; Roscoe Pound named him as among the top ten American judges of all time, and Bernard Schwartz considered him “the most influential legal author of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.”

His book, General Principles of Constitutional Law in the United States of America was released in 1880. Cooley treated the Second Amendment as an individual right. Indeed, Cooley went further and pointed out that if the right to arms were limited to militia-related arms possession, then the guarantee would be meaningless. The very government which it was meant to check (and which could control the definition of the militia) would be in a position to define its boundaries and negate any checks upon itself, defeating the Framers’ intent.

It may be supposed from the phraseology of this provision that the right to keep and bear arms was guaranteed only to the militia; but this would be an interpretation not warranted by the intent. The militia, as has been elsewhere explained, consists of those persons who, under law, are liable to the performance of military duty, and are officered and enrolled for service when called upon. But ... if the right were limited to those enrolled, the purpose of this guaranty might be defeated altogether by the action or neglect to act of the government it was meant to hold in check. The meaning of the provision undoubtedly is, that the people, from whom the militia must be taken, shall have the right to keep and bear arms, and they need no permission or regulation of law for the purpose.

This interpretation is may or may not be consistent with a “civic purpose only” understanding, depending upon how “civic purpose” is defined. If “civic purpose” is seen as including “widespread civilian armament will deter tyranny,” Cooley would fit the mold. If it is defined as “the right to bear arms exists only as linked to the militia,” Cooley’s text is a sharp repudiation of the view: as he points out, if that were the case, the very government which is to be deterred would have the power to eliminate the deterrence.

AWRM makes no mention of Cooley’s work.

169 Id. at 298-99 (3d ed. 1898).
Oliver Benjamin’s Rights of an American Citizen. AWRM brings in another, and rather obscure, commentator. So far as can be seen, Oliver Benjamin published some early texts on business law and business forms. In 1832, he authored The Rights of An American Citizen, With A Commentary on State Rights, and on the Constitution and Policy of the United States.

AWRM discusses Oliver’s position that the militia portion of the amendment was its true purpose, adding: “Indeed, Oliver declared that the original understanding of the right to bear arms was ‘intended to apply to the right of the people to bear arms for such purposes only.” Oliver conceded that this original understanding was being challenged by the new view that saw this right in more individualistic terms…”

Oliver does take rather a “collective rights” view, but his conclusions are more tentative (he used the qualifier “probably”) than AWRM suggests. Moreover, his concession that there was a rival interpretation gives no suggestion that it was a newly-evolved view:

The provision of the constitution, declaring the right of the people to keep and bear arms, &c, was probably intended to apply to the right of the people to bear arms for such purposes only, and not to prevent congress or the legislatures of the different states from enacting laws to prevent the citizens from always going armed. A different construction however has been given it.

To be sure, if we are assessing original understanding, a contemporary nonacademic commentator is entitled to consideration. On the other hand, one might wonder why AWRM includes the almost-unknown Oliver, while completely omitting Rawle and Cooley.

AWRM also does not take account of other popular writers who departed from a militia-related understanding. Chief among these would be Joel Barlow, Revolutionary War veteran, who authored Advice to the Privileged Orders of the Several States of Europe. Barlow stood out as a renaissance man in a time in 170 AWRM describes Oliver’s commentary as “influential,” but gives no citation or evidence of this influence. AWRM at 152. The only other reference I can find to him comes in David B. Kopel, supra note 10, at 1399.

which such men were common: a clergyman and theologian, a popular poet, a successful diplomat, an American whose political writings were debated on the floor of Parliament.\footnote{See generally James Woodress, \textit{A Yankee's Odyssey: The Life of Joel Barlow} (1958).}

Barlow boasted of American laws "not only permitting every man to arm, but obliging him to arm," which draws a line between the individual right and the militia duty. He postulated the equality of men, and from this deduced, first, that they must form "an equal representative government “ and second, “that the people will be universally armed; they will assume those weapons for security which the art of war has invented for destruction."\footnote{Joel Barlow, \textit{supra} note 173, at 16-17, 46-47. For an exceptional thorough account of the lesser commentators of the early 19th century, see David B. Kopel, \textit{supra} note 10, at 1397-1408.}

In summary, AWRM’s treatment of early constitutional commentators falls far short of expectations. Of the four legal giants, two are completely omitted, and a third’s opinions unfairly recast to leave out everything he said about the Second Amendment, and substitute for them his discussion of the Militia Clause of Article I.

B. AWRM’s Treatment of Early American Caselaw.

There was fairly extensive treatment of the right to arms in early American caselaw. Antebellum cases mostly focused upon bans on carrying concealed weapons, and later cases upon bans of non-firesarms (brass knuckles, bowie knives, “Arkansas toothpicks”) or small pistols. The results broke down into four classes.

1. Arms restrictions (even concealed weapons bans) are unconstitutional, since arms bearing is an individual right and the legislature may not restrict any aspect of such a right. Illustrative are \textit{Bliss v. Commonwealth} \footnote{12 Ky. (2 Litt.) 90 (1822)} (striking a concealed weapons ban) and \textit{Nunn v. State} \footnote{1 Ga. 243 (1846)} (striking a handgun ban: “The right of the whole people, … and not militia only, to keep and bear arms of every description, and not merely such as are used by the militia, shall not be infringed…”). These clearly recognize an individual right to arms.

2. Concealed weapons bans are constitutional as a manner of time, place, and manner restriction, since, \textit{while arms bearing is an individual right}, these laws restrict only one manner of exercising it. Here we have State v. Chandler\(^{179}\) ("It interferes with no man's right to carry arms (to use its words) 'in full open view,' which places men upon an equality. This is a right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States ...") and State v. Reid\(^{180}\) (upholding the ban on concealed carry but adding “the legislature cannot inhibit the citizen from bearing arms openly, because it authorizes him to bear them for the purpose of defending himself and the state, and it is only when carried openly that they can be effectively used for defense."). These cases also recognize an individual right to arms.

3. Bans on carrying (but not ownership) of non-military type weapons are constitutional, since “bear arms” has a military connotation and thus links to military-type arms.

   Aymette v. State\(^{181}\) is the exemplar here, with the Tennessee court noting that the State guarantee was of a right to keep and bear for the common defense, in order for the people, as a body, to “protect the public liberty, to keep in awe those who are in power, and maintain the supremacy of the laws and the constitution.” Thus the court concluded that the right was applicable only to arms “usually employed in civilized warfare.”\(^{182}\)

   In a followup case, Andrews v. State,\(^{183}\) the Tennessee court refined the test, holding that keeping of arms was an individual right, and only bearing of them was subject to limitation, and then expansively reading “keep” to cover almost all ordinary use.\(^{184}\) “Bearing arms for the common defense may well be held to be political right … but the right to keep them, with all that is implied fairly as an incident of this right, is a private individual right, guaranteed to the citizen, not the soldier.”\(^{185}\)

   These cases recognize an individual right to keep arms, and an individual right to carry military-style arms.

4. In contrast, a variation of the “civic rights” view was found in State v. Buzzard, in which the three justices of the Arkansas Supreme Court split three ways, with the lead opinion taking the view that the ban was a reasonable regulation, and adding that the right to bear arms “for the common defense” meant only that the government might not impose regulations that interfered with the ability to resist tyranny, which a ban on concealed carry did not.

Approaches (1) and (2) are inconsistent with a “civic right” understanding; both treat the right to arms as a purely individual matter. Approach (3) is only marginally consistent with “civic right” (in the sense that the arms protected must be suitable for militia use, although their owner need have no militia purpose at the time); it is what I have entitled the hybrid individual right. Approach (4) is consistent with “civic right,” at least in a broad sense (a government may regulate weapons, so long as the regulation does not resist the capacity of the people to resist tyranny).

AWRM is quite selective in discussing this caselaw. We will examine each of the four classes and how they are treated in the text.

1. Arms restrictions are unconstitutional: Bliss and Nunn. AWRM mentions only Bliss, with most of the discussion centering upon the Legislature’s angry reaction to the decision.

2. Concealed carry limits are constitutional: there is an individual right to carry arms, but one mode of carry may be restricted: Chandler and Reid. AWRM does not mention these cases.

3. Carrying of arms may be restricted, so long as they are not of military or militia type: Aymette and Andrews. Here, AWRM discusses Aymette but not Andrews, which greatly narrowed the scope of that ruling, nor the fact that the rule was limited to carrying, and not possession, of arms—“bearing” of arms was seen as having military/civic reference, but not “keeping” of them.\(^{190}\)

4. Conceal weapons bans are constitutional, because concealed carry has nothing to do with the capability of resisting tyranny. Buzzard (at least the lead opinion, the court splitting 1-1-1). AWRM discusses the lead opinion.\(^{191}\)

AWRM then informs us, without citation, that most courts of the period rejected an individual view of the right to arms.\(^{192}\) That would have come as news to the Bliss, Nunn, Chandler, Reid, and Andrews courts. A standard that only pertained in Arkansas— to the extent one opinion of a court split 1-1-1 can be considered a standard-- is treated as the majority State rule.

The most interesting, authoritative, and appalling decision from this period relating to the right to arms is relegated to an end-note in AWRM, for no apparent reason other than that it would sink AWRM’s desired conclusion. Dred Scott v. Sanford\(^{193}\) deserves a fuller consideration. The U.S. Supreme Court there held that (1) the Missouri Compromise was unconstitutional, since slaves were property and might be taken anywhere and (2) the Court lacked jurisdiction, since free blacks were not citizens and hence there was no diversity of citizenship.

In the course of arguing (2), Chief Justice Taney noted that many states had slave codes regulating conduct of free blacks, and reasoned that many of the states that ratified the Constitution would not have done so if they had thought free blacks would, under it, acquire the rights of citizens. Then he listed those rights:

> For if they [free Blacks] were so received, and entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens, it would exempt them from the operations of the special laws and police regulations which they [the states] conceive to be necessary for their own safety. It would give to persons of the negro race, who were recognized as citizens in any one state of the union, the right to enter every other state whenever they pleased .... [A]nd it would give them full liberty of speech in public and in private upon all subjects upon which its own citizens might meet; to hold public meetings upon political affairs, and to keep and carry arms wherever they went.\textsuperscript{194}

The equating of keeping and carrying arms “wherever they went” with the right to bear arms is flatly impossible to reconcile with a “civic rights only” viewpoint.

AWRM’s endnote discussion\textsuperscript{195} argues the statement was \textit{dictum} (it is an alternate holding, and as one going to subject-matter jurisdiction, perhaps entitled to a certain primacy) and that in referring to “keep and carry” Taney could not have meant the Second Amendment, which refers to “keep and bear” arms.

\textit{AWRM does have a point here. The problem is that this point destroys its thesis.} It must be understood that the Court at this point is not summarizing Federal Bill of Rights guarantees. It is arguing that under Article IV, section 2 (requiring a state to accord citizens of other states all privileges and immunities accorded its own citizens), if free blacks were citizens, then when they traveled to a slave State the State would have to accord them the rights of its own citizens, including the right to arms. Thus Taney uses “keep and carry arms” as a summary of right to bear arms provisions, and not just as a specific descriptor of the Second Amendment.

The opinion thus inflicts serious damage on AWRM’s thesis. It indicates that the Court viewed \textit{all} right to arms clauses of the time as covering individual carry, for individual purposes, anywhere – “to keep and carry arms wherever they went,” in the words of the Court.

AWRM does discuss the Supreme Court’s ruling in \textit{Houston v. Moore},\textsuperscript{196} a pre-emption decision relating to a militia courtmartial. A delinquent Pennsylvania militiaman had been fined by a state militia courtmartial, acting pursuant to a State law that incorporated Federal militia statutes. The defendant argued that Congressional militia enactments pre-empted the field.

The majority opinion marked the first appearance of “conflict pre-emption” in Supreme Court caselaw, with the majority holding that the state law was permissible since it conflicted with no federal enactment.\textsuperscript{197} Justice Story dissented, essentially arguing that Congress had entirely occupied the field of militia regulation, leaving the States without even the power to enforce Federal laws on the subject. Story then quoted the Second Amendment with the diffident remark that it “may not, perhaps, be thought to have any important bearing upon this point,” but that if it did, it confirmed his analysis.\footnote{18 U.S. at 54.}

What is most remarkable about \textit{Houston} is what the Court did \textit{not} say. The key issue was what power States retained over the militia, with the majority allowing they had merely the power to enforce Federal laws, and the dissent denying even that. Yet the majority entirely passed over the Second Amendment, and even Justice Story’s dissent felt it was of doubtful relevance. If American jurists of 1820 had any conception that the Second Amendment affected the Federal militia powers, one might have expected it to be at the core of the decision.

AWRM treats Story’s dissent as “a reiteration of the civic conception of the Second Amendment, the right of citizens to keep and bear arms in a well-regulated militia….\footnote{AWRM at 135.}” But it is hardly surprising that a case arising out of a militia court martial should give rise to language about the militia. It is hard to see how a “right” of any type, civic or otherwise, was involved in the case. The militiaman was not exercising a right: he was being prosecuted for failing to carry out his duties!

An examination of the entire historical record suggests that Americans held differing views of the purpose of the right to arms. Some indeed spoke of it as a political/civic matter, tied to the militia system. Others saw it as an individual/civic matter, with private arms ownership deterring tyranny. Others viewed it as serving an individual need, an ancillary to a fundamental right of self-defense. Quite a few viewed it as serving multiple causes. A full understanding of all purposes is necessary, since the First Congress had to placate citizens concerned with each, which is the obvious explanation of why the Second Amendment does not stop with “being necessary to the security of a free state.”

Abolitionist writers did, as AWRM notes, make prominent use of an individual right for individual purposes.\footnote{AWRM at 152-55.} But they were not inventing the argument. They were building upon a framework dating back to 1688 and to Blackstone, if not farther,\footnote{See David B. Kopel, \textit{The Religious Roots of the American Revolution and the Right to Keep and Bear Arms}, 17 Journal on Firearms and Public Policy (2005); \textit{The Catholic Second Amendment}, 29 Hamline L. Rev. (forthcoming)} which had been well developed before abolitionism became an issue.
A Well Regulated Militia’s treatment of the Framing period can fairly be called one-sided; it emphasizes references to the militia, while references to a purely individual right are either omitted or re-interpreted in ways that do great violence to their meaning. Its treatment of the right to arms in the Early Republic suffers from more serious flaws, to the point of being completely unreliable. Of the four great commentators of the period, it entirely omits two, and completely mischaracterizes a third. It omits the majority of early caselaw on the right to arms, and creates the impression that a minority view (actually that of only one judge on one court) was the near-universal understanding.

One would not know from reading A Well Regulated Militia that the “individual right for individual purposes” position was taken by three of the four early Constitutional commentators, by a great majority of State courts, and by the United States Supreme Court. The text manages to inflate what was a minority position into an illusory majority status by omitting or recasting all the contrary evidence.

III. AWRM’s Treatment of the 14th Amendment.

The question of whether the 14th Amendment’s privileges and immunities clause was intended to incorporate (inter alia) the Federal Bill of Rights has been extensively explored by Akhil Amar202 and Michael Kent Curtis;203 whether it was meant to incorporate the Second Amendment has been explored by Stephen Halbrook,204 Robert Cottrol and Ray Diamond.205 All these commentators have pointed to frequent references in Congress – in particular, by the Amendment’s sponsors, Senator Jacob Howard and Representative John A. Bingham – to the former Confederate states’ Black Codes, which forbade arms ownership by black citizens, and to how these (1) violated the rights of individuals to keep and bear arms or (2) would be ruled out by the proposed 14th Amendment.

AWRM contends that the notion of an individual right to arms for individual self-defense arose from antebellum abolitionist thought,206 and it accepts that the sponsors of the 14th Amendment were prominent abolitionists.\textsuperscript{207} Even if one were skeptical of a purely individual right based on the Second Amendment, one might expect AWRM to find such a right in the 14th.

AWRM instead begins by noting that some legislators spoke of the 14th Amendment as promoting equality rather than in terms of incorporating the Bill of Rights. Since the Amendment also contains the equal protection of the law clause, the fact that some supporters stressed equality while others stressed incorporation is not dispositive.

AWRM then adds that “sorting out what the state legislatures and the vast majority of Americans thought about the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment is more difficult,” and invokes stump speeches from the 1866 election, which it contends stressed considerations of equality.\textsuperscript{208} As noted above, a stress upon the equal protection clause hardly disproves an intent to incorporate under the privileges and immunities clause. Moreover, Professor Curtis’ research found extensive references to the 14th Amendment as intended to incorporate the Bill of Rights in contemporary newspapers, speeches and, most vitally, in the State legislative debates on ratification.\textsuperscript{209} These are of far greater weight in determining constitutional purpose than are electoral speeches.

AWRM treats at length the appalling decision of United States v. Cruikshank,\textsuperscript{210} which dismissed a prosecution for having broken up a meeting of blacks, disarming them, and then killing over a hundred of them, with the Court holding that none of these activities were barred by the 14th Amendment’s privileges and immunities clause or by its enforcing legislation, since rights to peaceable assembly, to arms and to life were not “privileges and immunities” of U.S. citizenship. AWRM believes that it find in the decision the beginning of the “collective right” view, since the Court said that the right of “bearing arms for lawful purposes” was not a right created by the Second Amendment. From this, AWRM deduces that the opinion held that “The purpose of the amendment was to guard the state militias against the danger of federal disarmament.”\textsuperscript{211}

This is a misunderstanding of Cruikshank – but then, Cruikshank is an easily misunderstood opinion. The ruling must be read against the background of The Slaughterhouse Cases,\textsuperscript{212} whose reasoning was essentially: (1) the 14th Amendment refers to privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States; (2) it must thus be read (very restrictively) to cover only rights that were \textit{created} by the U.S.

Constitution; (3) it thus does not cover pre-existing “natural” rights that the Constitution or Bill of Rights guaranteed but did not create. Thus the Cruikshank Court wrote off the right to assemble, because “The right was not created by the [First] Amendment…”\(^{213}\) It did the same for the Second Amendment, noting that arms bearing for lawful purposes “is not a right granted by the Constitution. Nor is it in any manner dependent upon that instrument for its existence…”\(^{214}\)

Cruikshank, in short, had nothing to do with a collective right approach. If anything, it suggests that the Court viewed individual arms bearing as a natural right (albeit one therefore not enforceable under the 14th Amendment!)

AWRM’s treatment of the 14th Amendment thus tracks its treatment of the Second Amendment. In each case, the fact that certain Framers on certain occasions spoke of one aspect of a right is regarded as evidence that they (and others) had no additional understanding of it and its purpose.

IV. Logical Consequences of a Civic Right Only Approach.

AWRM is a historical work, and as such need not consider the further legal question: assuming arguendo that a “civic right only” theory were proven, in the sense that the relevant historical record referred only to a civic militia-centric conception of the right, leaving other purposes to silence, what effect would this have on interpretation of the right to arms?

A. Interpretative Methodology.

As Professor Levinson has observed, the Second Amendment at times seems to exist in some manner of interpretative alternate universe, in which those who defend an expansive reading of the First, Fourth, Fifth and other Amendments tend to prefer the narrowest possible reading of the Second, and vice versa.\(^{215}\) It may thus be interesting to visit other attempt to narrow rights in light of what were alleged to be their expressed purposes.

Edwin Meese, Attorney General under the Reagan Administration, made such an effort by arguing that First Amendment freedom from establishment arose in the context of preventing one church from achieving legal supremacy over others, and hence should not prevent governmental preferences to all churches as a group.\(^{216}\) For this, he was taken to task by Professor Levy.\(^{217}\)

A more condign fate befell Judge Robert Bork, after he argued that "Constitutional protection should be accorded only to speech that is explicitly political. There is no basis for judicial intervention to protect any other form of expression, be it scientific, literary, or that variety of expression we call obscene or pornographic."²¹⁸

AWRM’s application illustrates the different forms of originalism. Originalism began as “original intent” – what did the Framers intend? It has evolved into “original understanding” – what did Americans understand they were ratifying?²¹⁹ Professor Balkin has distinguished a third form of originalism, which he terms “original application” – would the Framers or their contemporaries have upheld or stricken the law in question – and which he feels should not bind the modern interpreter.²²⁰

AWRM tends toward a different and quite restrictive form, which we might entitle “original problem resolution” – a right should be construed as extending only to cover those specific problems that the Framers experienced or foresaw.

The problem with this approach is that it would narrowly define our rights in terms of the problems which Americans felt worthy of commentary in 1787-91. Most of these indeed dealt with the risks of political tyranny: Americans of the time felt that they had just escaped one tyrant, and feared they might be creating another. The proposed Constitution gave Congress power to regulate the militia. It was thus only natural that antifederalist critics would frequently invoke the right to arms in a militia context. We cannot know what a given Framer thought, but only what he wrote, and political advocacy is driven by problems of the day rather than broad principles.

Indeed, it would not be difficult to use this approach as did Attorney General Meese or Judge Bork, to narrow the First Amendment beyond what its text or spirit permits. Any interpretative methodology that can be used to constrain the Second

²²⁰See http://balkin.blogspot.com/2005/06/original-meaning-and-original.html Amendment can as easily be employed to constrain the First. A brief effort (based on Professor Curtis’s excellent history\textsuperscript{221}) follows:

1. Freedom of expression, like the right to arms, comes into American thought via the English Whig movement,\textsuperscript{222} although it lacks the common law underpinnings of the right to arms. In fact, throughout the common law period, dissent was largely equated to treason, and until 1694 publishers of books on politics or religion had to obtain a license for each work.\textsuperscript{223}

2. Most Framing-era discussions of freedom of speech and press relate to protection of political speech and the risk of a return of press licensing for political tracts.\textsuperscript{224} The dominant major First Amendment concern over that period was whether the new government would suppress political expression as a means of achieving tyranny.

3. Therefore, if we apply AWRM’s methodology here, freedom of expression should extend no farther than protection of political speech, and perhaps even there only so far as prevention of prior restraint. Indeed, here we have the further evidence in the form of the 1798 Sedition Act, in which an early Congress criminalized criticism of itself or the President, and which early courts upheld as involving neither press licensing nor prior restraint.\textsuperscript{225}

The actual outcome illustrates the error of this approach. While Framing-period Americans had spoken of freedom of expression largely in a political and prior-restraint context, when the right was challenged by the Sedition Act, they spoke more broadly – and acted more broadly, essentially destroying the Federalist Party. From about 1800 onward, the unconstitutionality of measures such as the Sedition Act became universally accepted.\textsuperscript{226} It was not that Americans had changed their mind: it was that they had had less reason to record and express the full breadth of their feelings on the matter in 1787-1789. And, perhaps, they had thought “Congress shall make no law” was both sufficient and unambiguous.

B. Policy Implications.

AWRM’s main policy impact comes in its argument that a “civic purpose only” individual right would be consistent with a wide variety of firearm regulations.

It points out that the colonies and early states had a variety of regulations—although these were largely aimed either at limited time, place, and manner restrictions (carrying concealed weapons), or aimed at individuals seen as dangerous or outside the political vale—Indians, slaves, those in Pennsylvania who refused to swear an oath of allegiance during the Revolution. The latter can hardly be involved to demonstrate an understanding of the scope of rights; The same Pennsylvania authorities who disarmed those who refused to sign an oath also arrested them without probable cause, searched their residences under general warrants, and seized their political papers. What is done to wartime outsiders—and those refusing the oath were seen as enemies in an “us or them” situation—rarely reflects sound rights-consciousness.

It includes a Boston statute forbidding placing of loaded guns within a house or building—although on examination that appears to have been a manner of early Fire Code and, amusingly, also requires unloading of cannon and mortars indoors. 18th century firefighting apparently had some unusual risks.

I have noted the key difficulty in defining the “civic right” approach, in that it tends to confute two different concepts: (1) tyranny will be impeded by a militia system and (2) tyranny will be impeded by widespread arms ownership. We will examine the practical aspects of each separately.

Practical Results of “tyranny will be impeded by the militia” Civic Right

We start with the assumption that the Second Amendment was meant solely to ensure existence of a militia that could deter or impede a tyrannical government.

In application, this approach would (if it were to make any sense) follow the outline laid out a century ago by Judge Cooley, viz. that there is an individual right, meant to buttress the militia, but not limited to its enrolled members (since the government may define who is in the militia, and thus the right would have no value against abusive government if so limited). To argue that the result is that only militia activities are covered is to lapse into the collective right approach, which AWRM repudiates.

If we take this definition, the civic right concept in practice resembles the “hybrid” individual right, recognized in Aymette v. State. Presumably, a legislature can outlaw weapons which have no militia/military function. It can proscribe brass knuckles and billy clubs, since militia functions do not contemplate bludgeoning tyrants, insurrectionaries, or criminals. Conversely, outlawing machine guns, assault rifles, .50 caliber rifles and the like would involve infringement of the right’s very core.

A government could likely restrict concealed carry, since concealment has no particular link to political resistance, but could not not restrict open carry or use. It could not forbid ownership of handguns, since one of the traditional purposes of the militia is law enforcement – “to enforce the laws of the Union.” Indeed, law enforcement was probably the most frequent use of the militia, its wartime use being limited to the War of 1812 and minor roles in a few campaigns of the Civil War. The first national “calling out” of the militia was for law enforcement – suppressing the Whiskey Act Rebellion of 1793 – and the most recent state “calling out” which has been located was for the same purpose – suppressing a 1920 lynch mob that was comprised, paradoxically, of National Guardsmen.

The one construction that is indefensible under this view would be “the right to arms only covers members of a well-regulated militia.” This is indefensible for the reason given by Judge Cooley: only the government can create a well-regulated militia, and hence a right limited to such a group would be of no value as a check upon government.

Practical Results of “Tyranny will be impeded by an armed people.”

If we take the second definition, then the core of the individual “civic right” concept appears to be that individual persons have the right to keep and bear arms for the purpose of (to take the words from Aymette v. State) “to keep in awe those in power.” Just what legislation would pass this constitutional standard?

Certainly not the ban on civilian ownership of post-1986 machine guns. Those “in power” have millions of these at their disposal. And certainly not proposals for bans on “assault weapons,” their semiautomatic brethren. The civic rights only view might (like the hybrid right view) permit banning a weapon because it was too innocuous, but not because it was too powerful.

Firearm permit systems? The concept of making a check upon governmental abuses contingent upon obtaining a governmental permit does seem of dubious utility, and unlikely to have been within the contemplation of the Framers.

Registration? This might be questionable. There is little to be said for registration alone as a crime fighting tool, but handing the government a convenient list of which citizen owns which firearms would certainly undermine any purpose of deterring tyranny.

AWRM argues that some measures might pass muster – safe storage requirements, perhaps a modest tax on guns, mandatory liability insurance (although one might wonder what could be covered). But on all major firearms issues, it would seem that the “civic rights” approach would yield at least as broad a right as would a purely individual right-self defense formulation.

The same rationale would seemingly apply here: if a government is to be checked by freedom of speech and arms, it cannot hold the power to burden either, at will, with special taxes. There is the additional incongruity of basing a right on a citizen’s duty to serve the community and State, and then taxing him when he makes ready to fulfill the duty.

CONCLUSION

The Framers and their contemporaries universally endorsed a right to arms, but various of them saw it as serving various purposes. Some stressed the militia system, some stressed the value of an armed people, some stressed self-defense and many cited a combination of these. A Well Regulated Militia does an excellent job of outlining the first, but omits evidence of the latter considerations, or is forced to try to re-interpret the considerable body of evidence which is inconsistent with its thesis. It provides new insights into the American law of self-defense and other aspects of American history, but it falls very short when it comes to analysis of early caselaw, and of the 14th Amendment.

A Well Regulated Militia does illustrate how the right to arms is an excellent tool for teaching constitutional law. Most other constitutional provisions have devolved (if we may dare say so) into a matter of reading a succession of cases (or alternately cramming the Law in a Nutshell series). Exploring the right to arms requires consideration of historical materials, interpretative methodologies, varieties of originalism, 14th Amendment interpretation, and policy considerations. In the case of the right to arms, we can see early 19th Century courts grappling over issues such as time, place and manner restrictions that courts would not face, in any other constitutional context, for another century. It is an ongoing dialogue, with room for new additions. A Well Regulated Militia is the latest addition – the first in perhaps twenty years – to this debate.
