University of California, Davis

From the SelectedWorks of Dennis Ventry

February 16, 2010

Saving Seaborn: Ownership Not Marriage as the Basis of Family Taxation

Dennis Ventry

Available at: https://works.bepress.com/dennis_ventry/1/
Later this year, one of the most famous Supreme Court tax cases will celebrate its eightieth birthday. In Poe v. Seaborn, the Court reified two principles of the federal income tax: ownership determines tax liability and state law determines ownership. This Article establishes that tax liability for families continues to follow ownership not marriage, despite the federal government’s position that the “ownership equals taxability” principle applies exclusively to heterosexual spouses. Verifying the broad application of this principle carries significant implications for all families. Under the aegis of Seaborn, it authorizes members of state-recognized relationships—marriages, domestic partnerships, civil unions—to file federal income taxes according to ownership interests under state law, an outcome at odds with current treatment.

To prove that ownership of income and property rather than marriage determines family tax liability, this Article traces the “ownership equals taxability” principle from the late nineteenth century to after World War II; that is, from the decades leading up to ratification of the Sixteenth Amendment to the Supreme Court’s landmark decision in Seaborn and beyond. It is a story of the early federal income tax; of tax avoidance opportunities for families; of the nature of spouses’ legal interests as defined by state property laws; and of early tax enforcement efforts by the Treasury Department and Congress. It is also a story of how the Supreme Court protected Congress’ taxing power and the federal purse by articulating an expansive definition of ownership for tax purposes, particularly in the context of the family.

INTRODUCTION ............................................................................................................................... 2
I. FAMILY TAXATION AND AVOIDANCE UNDER THE NASCENT FEDERAL INCOME TAX ................. 6
II. THE NATURE OF SPOUSES’ INTEREST IN MARRITAL INCOME AND PROPERTY ......................... 14
III. CO-OWNERSHIP AND THE TAX CONSEQUENCES OF COMMUNITY PROPERTY LAW ................. 23
   A. The Treasury Department and California Tax “Evaders” ......................................................... 25
IV. THE LEGISLATIVE ATTACK AGAINST THE COMMUNITY PROPERTY TAX LOOPHOLE ............... 29
V. THE SUPREME COURT AND FAMILY TAXATION: DEFINING OWNERSHIP .................................. 37
   A. Control, Beneficial Interests, Enjoyment, and Other Indicia of Ownership ......................... 41
      1. Trusts: Relinquishing Control, Part I ......................................................................................... 42
      2. Assignments: Relinquishing Control, Part II ........................................................................... 46
      3. Income as Consumption and Control as Ownership .............................................................. 49
VI. POE V. SEABORN: OWNERSHIP UNDER STATE PROPERTY LAW EQUALS TAXABILITY .......... 53
VII. FROM LODESTAR TO LEGAL FICTION ...................................................................................... 59
    A. The Politics of Taxing the Family ............................................................................................ 64
CONCLUSION ........................................................................................................................................ 73

*Associate Professor of Law, UC Davis School of Law. I thank Steve Bank, Karen Burke, Pat Cain, Miranda Fleischer, Paul Horton, Michelle Kane, Bert Lazerow, Leandra Lederman, Stephanie McMahon, Ajay Mehrotra, Susie Morse, Grayson McCouch, Susan Westerberg Prager, Joe Thorndike, and David Walker. In addition, I benefited from comments received at the Indiana University School of Law Tax Policy Colloquium, the USD School of Law Tax Law Speaker Series, the American Association of Law Schools Annual Meeting, and the Jr. Tax Scholars Workshop.
INTRODUCTION

Later this year, one of the most famous U.S. Supreme Court tax cases will celebrate its eightieth birthday. In Poe v. Seaborn, the Court reified two principles of the federal income tax: first, ownership determines tax liability,\(^1\) and second, state law determines ownership.\(^2\) For eight decades, federal courts\(^3\) and the Internal Revenue Service\(^4\) have cited Seaborn’s “ownership equals taxability” holding, both with respect to family income and “other income as well.”\(^5\) Its application is so extensive that every April 15, tens of millions of taxpayers attest to their tax liability by applying Seaborn whether they realize it or not.\(^6\)

\(^1\) 282 U.S. 101, 110 (1930) (holding that the federal income tax assesses a levy “upon the net income of every individual,” and that “the word ‘of’ denotes ownership”).
\(^2\) Id. (in determining ownership of income and property to be taxed under the federal income tax, the “answer is found in the statutes of the State”).
\(^3\) See e.g., Morgan v. Comm’r, 309 U.S. 78, 82 (1940) (finding “in the application of a federal revenue act, state law controls in determining the nature of the legal interest which the taxpayer had in the property or income sought to be reached by the statute”); Helvering v. Stuart, 317 U.S. 154, 161 (1942) (“When Congress fixes a tax on the possibility of… the distribution of income, the ‘necessary implication,’ we think, is that the possibility is to be determined by the state law.”); United States v. Mitchell, 403 U.S. 190, 198 (1971) (holding “Federal income tax liability follows ownership. In the determination of ownership, state law controls.”); Comm’r v. Dunkin, 500 F. 3d 1065, 1069 (9th Cir. 2007) (finding ownership determines taxability and state law determines ownership); Raymond v. United States, 355 F.3d 107, 112 n. 8 (2d Cir. 2004) (finding “a married couple could ‘split’ income derived from property co-owned by operation of law” as defined by state property law); United States v. Goodyear, 99 F.2d 523 (9th Cir. 1938) (finding taxability follows ownership and California property law provides spouses equal fifty-percent interest in all marital income and property); Simmons v. Cullen, 197 F. Supp. 179, 181 (N.D. Cal. 1961) (finding “the incidence of the tax follows ownership of the income,” and ascertaining ownership “is governed by local rather than Federal law”); Mitchell v. Comm’r, 2008 U.S. Tax Ct. LEXIS 33 *7-8 (2008) (writing “tax liability for income from property attaches to the owner of the property,” and “[s]tate law determines the nature of a property interest”); Westerdahl v. Comm’r, 82 T.C. 83 (1984) (stating federal income tax liability based on ownership under state property law); Bagur v. Comm’r, 66 T.C. 817, 820 (1976) (stating federal income taxation follows ownership and “State law determines the ownership of income” to be taxed); Bishop v. Comm’r, 4 T.C. 588, 592 (1945) (holding “ownership is the test of taxability” and state property law determines ownership); Dotson v. Comm’r, T.C. Summary Opinion 2004-164 at *4 (2004) (noting “the well-established principle that income from property is taxed to the owner of the property” and “State law controls in deciding…property interests”); Witcher v. Comm’r, T.C. Memo 2002-292 at *7 (2002) (finding “income from property is taxed to the owner of the property”).
\(^5\) Mitchell, 403 U.S. at 198.
\(^6\) For qualifying married couples, the administrative convenience of joint filing (26 U.S.C. § 1(a)(1)), which assumes equal ownership of all marital income and property, may obscure Seaborn’s salience but it does not nullify its application.
Despite Seaborn’s pervasiveness, the IRS recently ruled that the “ownership equals taxability” principle applies exclusively to married couples, and more pointedly, to heterosexual married couples.\(^7\) The government’s primary argument is that case law relating to Seaborn “has always arisen solely in the context of spouses.”\(^8\) That claim is false\(^9\) and unavailing. Seaborn involved the allocation of taxable income and property between spouses, but nothing in the Court’s decision limited its application to husbands and wives.

This Article establishes that taxability follows ownership, not marriage. Verifying the broad application of this principle carries significant implications for taxpayers and taxpaying families nationwide. It would affect the 565,000 same-sex couples that the federal tax system does not currently recognize as constituting family units,\(^10\) as well as the remaining members of the 8.8 million gay, lesbian, and bisexual population that may also enter into committed relationships.\(^11\) These families, many of which are recognized under the laws of their state as possessing rights similar or equivalent to opposite-sex married couples,\(^12\) are prohibited from filing joint tax returns like other spouses, a prohibition that creates undue complexities, including the application of differential tax rates, conflicting state and federal tax rules for the same transaction or form of income, and expensive tax planning designed to formalize rights and obligations that occur naturally for married taxpayers (such as rights of survivorship). Applying

\(^7\) Chief Counsel Advice 200608038 (Feb. 24, 2006). See also infra notes 470-86.

\(^8\) Id. at 3.

\(^9\) See e.g., Teschner v. Comm’r, 38 T.C. 1003 (1962) (involving allocation of income from contest winnings between father and daughter); Hogan v. United States (unreported), 57 AFTR2d 86-838, 85-2 USTC para. 9846 (D. Me. 1985) (involving the tax treatment of earnings of a Jesuit priest who had taken a vow of poverty). See also infra Parts V.A.1 and V.A.2 examining cases involving trusts and assignments of income and property.

\(^10\) Gary J. Gates, Same-Sex Spouses and Unmarried Spouses in the American Community Survey, 2008 2, WILLIAMS INSTITUTE (Oct. 2009). This figure includes 51,500 California registered domestic partners and 18,000 same-sex married couples in California (see id., Appendix, Table 2), the group that would be most directly affected by universal recognition of the “ownership equals taxability” principle. See infra notes 469-86.

\(^12\) These families include members of same-sex marriages, domestic partnerships, civil unions, and other legal relationships formalized by a state.
the “ownership equals taxability” principle universally under the federal income tax could also affect the 6.7 million opposite-sex couples currently living with partners outside of marriage.\(^\text{13}\)

This Article contributes to the debate over how to tax traditional versus non-traditional families.\(^\text{14}\) But its conclusions implicate all forms of legally formalized relationships, personal as well as business. For purposes of focusing the discussion, this Article applies the “ownership equals taxability” principle primarily to the family setting.

Proving that ownership of income and property, rather than marriage, determines family tax liability requires an historical examination. Notwithstanding \textit{Seaborn’s} importance in establishing one of the bedrock principles of the federal income tax, we know next to nothing of the historical and jurisprudential developments that culminated in the decision. This Article remedies that deficiency. It traces the “ownership equals taxability” principle from the late nineteenth century to 1930; that is, from the decades leading up to ratification of the Sixteenth Amendment to the U.S. Supreme Court’s landmark decision in \textit{Seaborn}. It is a story of the early federal income tax; of tax avoidance opportunities for families; of the nature of spouses’ legal interests as defined by state property laws; and of early tax enforcement efforts by the Treasury Department and Congress. It is also a story of how the Supreme Court protected Congress’ taxing power and the federal purse by articulating an expansive definition of ownership for tax purposes that relied on indicia of ownership such as control, management, dominion, beneficial and equitable interests, and enjoyment of rights constituent of ownership.

\(^{13}\) \textit{U.S. Census Bureau Press Release, Census Bureau Reports Families with Children Increasingly Face Unemployment} (Jan. 15, 2010), \textit{available at} \texttt{http://www.census.gov/Press-Release/www/releases/archives/families_households/014540.html}.

Seaborn illuminates these legal, political, and sociological storylines. But its legacy is as important to this Article as the events leading up to the Court’s decision. In the aftermath of Seaborn, the Court continued to articulate an expansive definition of ownership and income to curb taxpayers’ insatiable appetite for tax avoidance. “Technical considerations,” the Court wrote in its most well-known trust case, “niceties of the law of trusts or conveyances, or the legal paraphernalia which inventive genius may construct as a refuge from surtaxes should not obscure the basic issue,” which in the case at hand involved artificially shifting income within the family unit.15 But while the Court scrutinized private law for contrivances (including instruments such as trusts, contracts, assignments, and gifts), it respected without exception how states’ general law allocated ownership interests within families (both with respect to community property and common law regimes).16 It even looked the other way when Congress enacted the income-splitting joint return in 1948—an administrative device that treated all spouses’ income and property as owned fifty-fifty for federal tax purposes—because the legal fiction of income splitting did not disturb ownership interests as defined by state property law.17

Eighty years after Seaborn and sixty years after passage of the income splitting provision, ownership of income and property remains the lodestar of family taxation. Indeed, the IRS

---

16 As this Article demonstrates, the distinction between private law and general law animated the Supreme Court’s jurisprudence in family taxation. In particular, the Court saw tax avoidance and artificiality behind “voluntary” or “consensual” private law arrangements that reduced tax liability, while it attached legitimacy to “involuntary” and “legal” general property law regimes that applied uniformly and without an eye toward tax reduction. See Comm’r v. Harmon, 323 U.S. 44, 47 (1944) (invalidating Oklahoma’s optional community property law on grounds it created a “consensual” rather than a “legal” community enacted solely for federal tax purposes).
17 Stephanie Hunter McMahon, To Save State Residents: States’ Use of Community Property for Federal Tax Reduction, 1939-48, 27 LAW & HIST. REV. 585, 621-22 (2009) (stating the split-income provision “did not affect state-defined property rights in any way,” but merely extended to all married couples “the benefit of income-splitting without having to divide the ownership of family property between spouses”).
position notwithstanding, taxability follows ownership defined by state property law and not the presence or absence of a marriage license. This Article removes the false barometer of marriage between a man and woman as the basis of family taxation, and reestablishes ownership principles grounded in longstanding Supreme Court jurisprudence as the historically and legally accurate gauge for taxing families. In so doing, it argues that Seaborn authorizes members of all state-recognized families—marriage, common law marriage, domestic partnership, civil union—to file federal income taxes according to ownership interests as determined by state law. For those legally recognized families currently prohibited from filing joint returns, Seaborn entitles them to file two federal tax returns each reflecting one-half total family income.

I. FAMILY TAXATION AND AVOIDANCE UNDER THE NASCENT FEDERAL INCOME TAX

The modern federal income tax was born in 1913 after three-quarters of the states ratified the Sixteenth Amendment.\(^\text{18}\) Within months of ratification, Congress enacted an income tax law that was modest by any standard. The new levy assessed a “normal” tax of one percent on incomes above $3,000 for single individuals and $4,000 for married couples as well as a progressive “surtax” ranging from one to six percent on incomes above $20,000.\(^\text{19}\) All taxpayers—single, married, with or without dependents—were subject to the same rate schedule.\(^\text{20}\) As its Progressive Era advocates had envisioned,\(^\text{21}\) the tax fell disproportionately on \(^\text{19}\) Revenue Act of 1913, 38 Stat. 114, 166 (1913). The flat “normal” tax rate was assessed on taxable income above exemption levels and below an income ceiling of $20,000, while the graduated “surtax” rates were assessed on all taxable income above the ceiling.

---

\(^\text{20}\) By comparison, since 1969, the federal income tax has contained four different rate schedules for individual taxpayers: married individuals filing joint returns and surviving spouses; heads of households; single individuals; and married individuals filing separate returns. 26 U.S.C. § 1.
the rich. Adjusted for inflation, the exemption levels created a tax-free threshold for singles and married couples, respectively, of $65,000 and $85,000.\textsuperscript{22} Meanwhile, only taxpayers with incomes exceeding $430,000 (adjusted) were subject to the surtax rates, with the top marginal rate only hitting incomes above $10,700,000 (adjusted).\textsuperscript{23} The class-based federal income tax with its generous zero-bracket levels exempted 98 percent of all households.\textsuperscript{24}

Under the 1913 statute, married taxpayers could file separate or joint returns at their discretion. Families in which one spouse earned all the taxable income filed joint returns, while families with two earners filed either jointly or separately. Separate filing produced tax benefits, because the statute allocated a higher exemption to spouses remitting taxes on separate returns versus joint returns. When filing separately, each spouse was allowed one personal exemption of $3,000, while one of the spouses received an additional $1,000 exemption reserved for married taxpayers, resulting in a total exemption of $7,000.\textsuperscript{25} If the spouses aggregated family income on a single return, the statute only exempted $4,000 from income.\textsuperscript{26} Thus if a couple’s income exceeded $4,000, it paid higher taxes based simply on whether they filed separately or jointly.

The potential tax saving associated with filing separately remained small in the early years of the federal income tax due to low tax rates. The additional $3,000 exemption for couples filing separately, saved taxpayers with $7,000 in taxable income just $30, because the extra $3,000 in income would otherwise be subject to a tax rate of only one percent. Even taxpayers at the highest income levels, subject to the top marginal rate of seven percent, paid just $210 more

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item The top marginal rate of seven percent began at $500,000, unadjusted.
\item Compare these figures to 2010 exemption levels of $18,000 for married couples and $9,380 for single taxpayers.
\item Revenue Act of 1913, supra note 19, at 168.
\end{enumerate} \end{footnotesize}
on $3,000 of income if they filed jointly rather than separately. And since these taxpayers would have to report exceedingly high incomes ($500,000 unadjusted) to be subject to the full $210 “penalty,” it was unlikely that filing jointly would motivate them to seek tax avoidance devices.

The number of separate returns comprised only a fraction of all returns among married taxpayers in the early years of the income tax. In 1919, only 58,500 spouses out of 2.9 million married taxpayers (i.e., two percent) filed separate returns. This figure is significantly lower than the number of married couples statistically eligible to file separately. In 1920, nine percent of wives participated in the paid labor force, a participation rate that economic historians recognize as significantly under-representing the number of working women. Even white married women, the female cohort with the highest levels of family income and the most to gain from separate filing, achieved a participation rate of 6.5 percent.

The low number of separate filers relative to the percentage of families with two incomes may have reflected taxpayers’ confusion over the new income tax. We know that the government had yet to work out the kinks in applying separate versus joint filing. In a study on the early years of the federal income tax, the Bureau of Internal Revenue (BIR), predecessor to the Internal Revenue Service, acknowledged that it struggled with “the baffling problem of whether the income of husbands and wives living together should be viewed as a unit or as separate incomes regardless of whether they chose to make joint or separate returns.”

---

30 Goldin, supra note 28, at 142.

31 Louis Shere, Tax Revision 1937—Project No. 3, Miscellaneous and Administrative Tax Changes (Nov/ 19, 1937), at 4-5, OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/36.1.
created special confusion. If a married couple filed a joint return, the BIR almost always accepted the couple’s reporting position, and assessed graduated surtaxes on aggregate family income. If a couple filed separate returns, however, the agency often rejected the couple’s reporting position, and assessed surtaxes on aggregate income as if the couple had filed jointly in the first place. The policy “did not seem to derive from any clear conception” of how to tax married versus single taxpayers, but simply because it was “more convenient in some instances.” Taxpayers, too, may have preferred filing jointly rather than separately for the convenience. So long as rates remained low and exemptions high, there was little economic incentive to divide income on separate returns.

World War I changed everything. The Wilson administration relied heavily on the income tax to prosecute the war. In the process, it made paying taxes considerably more painful for wealthy Americans. The Revenue Act of 1916 more than doubled existing rates, raising the top marginal rate from 7 to 15 percent, while preserving the personal exemption levels. The 32 But see infra note 34.

---

33 Shere, supra note 31. The policy seemed to conflict with official Treasury guidance. See T.D. 2090 (1914) (instructing revenue agents to aggregate income “for the purpose of the normal tax only. The additional, or surtax, imposed by the act will be computed on the basis of the separate income of each individual.” Emphasis in original.); T.D. 2137 (1915) (same).
34 For this reason, the BIR attempted to glean married taxpayers’ intent when examining joint returns. “Where husband and wife clearly indicate on a single return form the net income of each,” the Treasury instructed its revenue agents, “such a return does not necessarily constitute a joint return. It is a matter of intent. Having separated their respective incomes, in the absence of a showing to the contrary the presumption is that they intended to file separate returns of income, but that for convenience they have used one form. In such case both the normal and surtax should be computed on the separate income of each. This presumption is, however, overcome if the tax has been computed by the taxpayer on the combined net income; in which case, even though their incomes have been separated and can be identified, the return is held to be a joint return, and both the normal and surtax should be assessed on the basis of combined net income.” O.D. 960, § 223, Article 401, No. 4 C.B. 255 (1921). See also O.D. 881, § 223, Article 401, No. 4 C.B. 254 (1921) (allocating the wartime excess profits tax exemption between spouses); O.D. 909, § 223, Article 401, No. 4 C.B. 254 (1921) (allocating deductions between spouses in community property states versus common law states); T.D. 3110, No. 4 C.B. 255 (1921) (allocating income of minor children).
37 Id., at 761.
statute also provided a graduated tax on estates exceeding $50,000 ($970,000 adjusted to 2009) with a top rate of 10 percent on estates above $5,000,000 \(^3\) ($97,000,000 adjusted).\(^4\)

High-income taxpayers charged the Wilson administration with pursuing a “soak the rich” program.\(^5\) They were right. In 1917, Congress gave the administration what it wanted, raising rates across the board, more than quadrupling the top marginal rate from 15 to 67 percent, and exposing lower levels of income to significantly higher taxes.\(^6\) In addition, it reduced personal exemption levels for individuals as well as married taxpayers,\(^7\) creating more than one-hundred thousand new income taxpayers. Despite lower exemptions, the levy remained a class-based tax, affecting only 15 percent of all households.\(^8\) The richest one percent of Americans, moreover, accounted for 80 percent of federal income tax receipts in 1918, and were subject to effective tax rates (i.e., including exemptions and deductions) exceeding 15 percent, up from 3 percent in 1916.\(^9\) The Revenue Act of 1918 raised rates again such that by war’s end personal income tax rates ranged between 12 and 77 percent,\(^10\) while estate tax rates reached 25 percent.\(^11\)

In five short years, the income tax went from generating a fraction of all federal tax receipts to generating a near-majority of national revenues.\(^12\) It also went from imposing a modest one-percent tax of $200 on taxable income of $20,000 to subjecting that income to ten different tax rates, ranging from 12 to 21 percent, for a total tax of $3,300, a jump of more than

\(^{3}\) Id., at 777-80.
\(^{4}\) Id., at 780-82.
\(^{5}\) The term “soak the rich” taxation was used widely in the United States and England to describe progressive taxation. See BROWNLEE, supra note 18, at 66 n. 27.
\(^{6}\) Revenue Act of 1917, 40 Stat. 300 (1917).
\(^{7}\) Id. at 301.
\(^{8}\) BROWNLEE, supra note 18, at 44.
\(^{9}\) Id. These figures do not account for the incidence of the corporate income tax, which would raise effective rates.
\(^{10}\) Revenue Act of 1918, 40 Stat. 1057, 1062 (1918).
\(^{11}\) Id.
\(^{12}\) See id. at 47-62. The federal income tax quickly eclipsed the partisan tariff and regressive excise taxes as the primary source of federal revenue.
Increases at higher income levels were equally staggering. On $100,000 of income, a taxpayer paid $2,500 in 1915 and $36,500 in 1918, while at $1,000,000, he paid $60,050 versus $704,530.49

Very quickly, taxpayers faced significant economic incentives to seek tax avoidance. Some of the early techniques included gifts of income and property both during life and at death, a multiplying array of trusts, joint ownership of property, assignments of income and property, and family partnerships. For taxpaying husbands and wives, opportunities to shift taxable income and property within the family unit abounded, and increased exponentially in the presence of children. The simple act of filing separately rather than jointly could produce significant tax savings. In 1918, a husband and wife with $100,000 of taxable income filing two separate returns of $50,000 paid $12,000 on each return for a total tax bill of $24,000. If the same couple filed jointly, it owed $36,500 with the last $50,000 of income subject to marginal rates ranging from 36 to 64 percent, resulting in a tax penalty of $12,600 and a tax bill more than 50 percent higher. The discrepancy was even greater if the couple could split its income not just twice, but three, four, or six times by also shifting income to other family members.

Tax authorities and policymakers were acutely aware of these opportunities, and began to track and quantify the tax avoidance. “Taxpayers on large incomes and businesses are finding a hundred different methods of legally reducing their obligations to the Government,” Treasury Secretary Andrew Mellon reported.50 Wartime surtaxes had “greatly stimulated avoidance, not to say, evasion of the tax,” concluded economist Thomas Adams, chair of the Treasury’s Tax

---

48 Between 1913 and 1915, the first $20,000 of taxable income was subject to a single rate of one percent. See Revenue Act of 1913, supra note 19, at 166; Revenue Act of 1918, supra note 45, at 1062.
49 Calculated from id.
50 CONG. REC. (May 8, 1924), at 8095 (statement of Sen. Walsh, quoting Mellon).
Advisory Board.\textsuperscript{51} “Revenues have been falling off, particularly the collections from richer taxpayers.”\textsuperscript{52} In fact, Adams found that taxpayers with incomes over $100,000 reported net income of $1.6 billion in 1917, but only $600 million in 1920. Part of the falloff was due to reductions in rates and increases in the personal and dependency exemptions.\textsuperscript{53} But most of the reduction was attributable to high-income taxpayers incorporating personal property, disposing of income and property through gifts, and shifting investments from taxable to tax-free securities. Adams was particularly critical of tax avoidance through gifting. He railed that “rich men have recently divided their property by gift, conveying it usually to members of the family and so dividing the former income into several parts.”\textsuperscript{54}

Adams likened the harmful practice of gifting among family members to married couples in community property states who divided family income in half on two separate tax returns. “Practically the same result,” Adams noted, “is reached in a number of southern and western states by the community property laws which bring a division of the ordinary family income.”\textsuperscript{55} Both practices were “major evils” that the government could remedy “rather easily.” Gifts could be made subject to the income or estate tax,\textsuperscript{56} and Congress could tax the donor at the time of transfer on appreciated property or require the donee to assume the donor’s basis.\textsuperscript{57} With respect to the “community property problem,” Congress could prohibit separate filing, and require all married couples to combine family income for tax purposes.\textsuperscript{58} Adams commented favorably on \textsuperscript{52} Id.

\textsuperscript{53} Revenue Act of 1921, 42 Stat. 227, 233 and 243 (1921).
\textsuperscript{54} Adams, \textit{supra} note 51, at 536.
\textsuperscript{55} Id.
\textsuperscript{56} In 1924, Congress enacted a gift tax to curb avoidance through inter vivos transfers. \textit{See} Revenue Act of 1924, 43 Stat. 253 (1924).
\textsuperscript{57} Adams was either unaware or unconcerned by the Supreme Court’s decision in Taft v. Bowers, 278 U.S. 470 (1929) (holding that donee takes donor’s basis in appreciated property and pays tax on any appreciation in the event of a later disposition, while donor goes untaxed on qualifying gifts).
\textsuperscript{58} Adams, \textit{supra} note 51, at 536.
the Wisconsin state income tax statute, which required husbands and wives to aggregate taxable income and property on a joint return.\textsuperscript{59} He urged the national Congress to take “action along these lines,”\textsuperscript{60} a position also advocated by Secretary Mellon. Permitting spouses in community property states to file separate returns reflecting half the family income “gives an unfair advantage to the citizens of those states over the citizens of the other states.”\textsuperscript{61} These “deeper defects” to the income tax, moreover, threatened its capacity to generate sufficient revenue.\textsuperscript{62}

The Treasury cracked down on family tax avoidance. For starters, it persuaded Congress to revise the personal exemptions by allocating a single exemption to husbands and wives whether filing jointly or separately. Under prior law, spouses filing jointly took the exemption for married couples, while husbands and wives filing separately were allowed one exemption for married couples and another for single individuals. Beginning in 1918, spouses were allocated the same total exemption no matter how they filed.\textsuperscript{63}

The most lucrative tax avoidance opportunities remained available to married couples despite Treasury’s best efforts. Husbands and wives could avoid the sting of steeply progressive rates by dividing family income on separate returns. They accomplished income shifting in a variety of ways, including through gifts of income and property, family trusts, joint ownership of property, assignments of income and property, and family partnerships. Married couples living in a minority of states enjoyed additional income-splitting opportunities by virtue of their property law regimes. The eight states that operated under community property law treated income and \textsuperscript{59} See Wis. Rev. Stat. §§ 71.05(2)(d) and 71.09(4)(c). See also infra notes 306-314 and accompanying text, discussing the statute in the context of Hoeper v. Tax Commission of Wisconsin, 284 U.S. 206 (1931) (invalidating Wisconsin income tax statute on grounds that it violated the Fourteenth Amendment).

\textsuperscript{60} Adams, \textit{supra} note 51, at 536.
\textsuperscript{61} 67 CONG. REC. 175-76 (Nov. 10 1923) (statement of Mellon).
\textsuperscript{62} \textit{Id}.
\textsuperscript{63} Revenue Act of 1917, \textit{supra} note 41, at 301.
property acquired during marriage as presumptively owned equally between husband and wife.\textsuperscript{64} Thus, under general property law precepts, marital income and property was already split in half such that for purposes of reporting federal tax liability, a community property married couple could file two separate returns each reflecting exactly half the family’s taxable income. If the Treasury Department wanted to eliminate this form of tax saving, it would have to abolish separate returns and require compulsory joint filing. In so doing, it would have to challenge determinations of property ownership and the nature of spouses’ interests in martial partnerships, a determination that had traditionally been the exclusive province of state governments.

II. THE NATURE OF SPOUSES’ INTEREST IN MARTIAL INCOME AND PROPERTY

Under traditional common law, marriage resulted in a unified rather than a shared property interest with nearly all incidents of ownership and control located in the husband. The reality was not far from Blackstone’s aphorism that the act of marriage consolidated the spouses’ otherwise individual interests into a single unity, the husband.\textsuperscript{65} Upon marriage, a wife’s personalty merged with that of her husband such that all her personal property—including clothes, jewelry, furniture—were owned by her spouse, whose power over them was absolute. He could literally sell the clothes off her back. And while she did not necessarily lose rights in her real property upon marriage, a married woman lost the ability to manage and control her realty. Her list of disabilities under the common law was long: she could neither enter into nor enforce a contract, neither file lawsuits nor be sued in her own name; she was prohibited from executing wills, holding property in her name, controlling her earnings (both in market and home \textsuperscript{64} The eight states included Arizona, California, Idaho, Louisiana, Nevada, New Mexico, Texas, and Washington. The other forty states operated under common law. Alaska and Hawaii would not become states until 1959.

\textsuperscript{65} \textsc{William Blackstone}, \textit{Commentaries on the Laws of England} 442 (1765) (“By marriage, the husband and wife are one person in law: that is, the very being or legal existence of the woman is suspended during the marriage, or at least is incorporated and consolidated into that of the husband: under whose wing, protection, and \textit{cover}, she performs everything.”).
production), or enjoying any rights in income, crops, or manufactured goods flowing from her realty. And although some early colonial statutes extended rights to married women, none of them seriously challenged traditional marital status under coverture.\(^{66}\)

Over the course of the nineteenth century, traditional common law underwent a revolution. Beginning in the 1830s, states adopted married women’s property statutes that chipped away at common law marital precepts by providing wives legal rights independent of husbands.\(^{67}\) The first wave of statutes protected certain kinds of property that married women brought into marriage from their husbands and their husband’s creditors.\(^{68}\) Later statutes granted married women additional separate ownership interests in property such as the ability to manage and control personal and real property acquired prior to marriage and by gift, inheritance, or bequest; to enjoy the profits from that property; to will, sell, or otherwise convey property to third parties; to control their own wages; to establish separate estates; and to have access to their

---

\(^{67}\) Most scholars identify Mississippi as the first state to enact a married woman’s property act. The statute provided wives limited property rights, largely in connection with protecting from her husband’s creditors any slaves she brought into marriage. See Sandra Moncrief, The Mississippi Married Women’s Property Act of 1839, 47 J. Miss. Hist. 110 (1985). Four years before enactment of the Mississippi statute, however, the territorial legislature in Arkansas adopted a law protecting a wife’s property from her husband’s debts. See Warbasse, supra note 66, at 159; Chused, supra note 66, at 1399.

\(^{68}\) See e.g., Warbasse, supra note 66, at 159-60 (concluding that “legislators appear to have been primarily concerned with keeping the wife’s property from being taken for the husband’s debts,” and that they “were really seeking to protect planters from financial disaster as much as to defend married women’s rights.”); Chused, supra note 66, at 1361, 1400-04 (arguing the economic panic of the 1830s prompted “legislatures to codify a portion of the equitable separate estate tradition by insulating wives’ property from their spouses’ creditors”); Linda E. Speth, The Married Women's Property Acts, 1839-1865: Reform, Reaction, or Revolution?, 2, in WOMEN AND THE LAW: A SOCIAL HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE 69, 74 (D. Kelly Weisberg ed., 1982) (“By leaving the husband with the common-law right of management and control of his wife’s property, yet preventing that property from being seized for his debts, the early married women’s property acts left the husband in a better position to withstand the hazards of the nineteenth-century economy.”); Peggy A. Rabkin, FATHERS TO DAUGHTERS: THE LEGAL FOUNDATIONS OF FEMALE EMANCIPATION (1980) (finding that statutory changes in women’s legal status was motivated by fathers’ desire to protect their daughters’ inheritance from husbands and husbands’ creditors). Contra Carole Shammas, Re-Assessing the Married Woman’s Property Acts, 6 J. Women’s Hist. 9, 24 (1994) (“In all the acts, pre-1848 and post, the common concern was for the fate of the woman’s patrimony, not for male bankrupts”).
Scholars have shown that the statutory changes neither “fully emancipate[d] wives from the common law of marital status” nor reified legal patriarchy. The truth lies somewhere in between. Given prevailing gender norms, statutory reforms to traditional common law never embraced equality between the sexes or shared ownership principles. Instead, they granted married women limited legal rights to separate property and earnings that may have hardened rather than softened traditional gender roles, with the wife responsible for home production and the husband responsible for market production.

While reformed common law emphasized the spouses’ separate interests, community property law presumed shared interests in common property. Community property law in the 71 See e.g., Kahn, supra note 69, (finding statutes encouraged wives’ entrepreneurialism as measured by the filing of federal patents); Shammas, supra note 68, at 15, 23 (“When viewed from the perspective of the early American period…the acts appear to be a more important turning point in female status,” and paved the way for women to “to make some decisions about their and their family’s own consumption, investments, and wealth transmission”).

72 See Donna C. Schuele, Community Property Law and the Politics of Married Women’s Rights in Nineteenth-Century California, 7 WEST. L. HIST. 244, 266 (1994) (under reformed common law “any discussion of equal treatment had to proceed from that system’s gendered, individualistic notions’’); Reva B. Siegel, Home as Work: the First Woman’s Rights Claims Concerning Wives’ Household Labor, 1850-1880, 103 YALE L. J. 1073, 1116 (1994) (describing failed efforts to “empower[ ] economically productive women to participate equally with men in managing assets both had helped to accumulate”).

73 See e.g., Siegel, supra note 70, at 2210 (describing how “the movement for egalitarian reform…work[ed] to modernize and so naturalize an antiquated body of status law”).

74 See e.g., WILLIAM A. REPP, JR. & WILLIAM Q. DEFUNIAK, COMMUNITY PROPERTY IN THE UNITED STATES (1975); WILLIAM Q. DE FUNIAK & MICHAEL J. VAUGHN, PRINCIPLES OF COMMUNITY PROPERTY (2d ed. 1971). Traditional common law shared with community property law an emphasis on unity of interest. But while the unity
United States was patterned primarily off the Spanish system of marital property, and recognized both common and separate property. All property acquired during marriage (unless acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent) was presumptively common property, and shared equally by husband and wife regardless of which spouse “earned” the property in the traditional market sense. Indeed, according to commentators at the time, “[t]he single common element” present in all community property statutes “is the notion of co-ownership, and it is submitted that husband and wife may best be considered as co-owners of the community property and as such to have ‘equal’ interests therein.” All “proprietary interests of the spouses are not merely united but unified; not mixed or blent, but identical.” Under community property law, “dependence of the wife” gave way to “conjugal interdependence.”

During marriage, the husband acted as manager of the common property for the benefit of the community. His management powers, however, did not entitle him to a larger share of the marital partnership, and the non-managing wife had the right to disturb her husband’s management in the event he shirked his obligations to the community. Spouses managed their own separate property during marriage, not because of any influence of common law ownership under traditional common law was contained within the husband, the unity under civil law was shared under the marital partnership in which each spouse possessed equal property interests. See e.g., Susan Westerberg Prager, The Persistence of Separate Property Concepts in California’s Community Property System, 1849-1975, 24 UCLA L. REV. 1, 6-7 (1976).

The only potential outlier is Louisiana. Scholars debate the origins of Louisiana community property law, and whether it originated from French or Spanish law. See e.g., Rodolfo Batiza, The Louisiana Civil Code of 1808: Its Actual Sources and Present Relevance, 46 TUL. L. REV. 4 (1971); Robert A. Pascal, Sources of the Digest of 1808: A Reply to Professor Batiza, 46 TUL. L. REV. 603 (1972). While Louisiana property law contains elements of both systems, its most salient provisions derive from Spanish law. See e.g., Harriet Spiller Daggett, 4 THE COMMUNITY PROPERTY SYSTEM OF LOUISIANA 6 (1945).

For Spanish civil law, see De Funiak & Vaughn, supra note 74, at 126-29; Richard A. Ballinger, A Treatise on the Property Rights of Husband and Wife under the Community or Ganancial System § 5 (1895).

Marion Rice Kirkwood, The Ownership of Community Property in California, 7 S. CAL. L. REV. 1, 16 (1933-34).

Id. at 67.

See infra notes 97-105 and accompanying text.

Id. See also Evans, supra note 78, at 65 (“Management and disposition may be vested in one or both, but that does not affect the proprietary interests.”); Kirkwood, supra note 77, at 16 (stating the “the superior powers of management vested in the husband are to be looked upon…as held by him in a representative, rather than a proprietary, capacity”).

17 principles, but because separate property was deemed to be acquired by “lucrative” sources of gratuitous transfer rather than through “onerous” activity for the benefit of the community.

Though co-ownership undergirded community property law in the United States, the eight community property regimes reflected variations of shared ownership. In particular, each state differed in important respects as to the nature of the wife’s interest in common property.

Washington practiced the purest form of community property, reflecting strong partnership and equality principles. The husband and wife formed a single entity under Washington law, and the entity (rather than one or both spouses) owned all community property in which husband and wife enjoyed equal rights and interests. The Washington statute made the husband the managing agent of the marital entity, but his absolute power of disposition over the entity’s property did not create in him a larger ownership share.

In Arizona, Idaho, Nevada, and New Mexico, the community property statutes emphasized equality of interests between spouses rather than the partnership model. Instead of the marital entity owning common property, husband and wife owned an undivided, indivisible, vested one-half of the community as individuals. It did not matter which spouse held record title

---

82 See DE FUNIAK & VAUGHN, supra note 74, at 126-29; REPPY & DEFUNIAK, supra note 74, at 129.
83 See e.g., Holyoke v. Jackson, 3 Wash. Terr. 235, 238-39 (Sup. Ct. 1882) (describing the “legal community” of husband and wife as “a partnership, in that some property coming from or through one or other or both of the individuals forms for both a common stock, which bears the losses and receives the profits of its management, and which is liable for individual debts”).
84 See e.g., Stockand v. Bartlett, 4 Wash. 730 (Sup. Ct. 1892); Miller v. Maddocks, 58 Wash. 695 (Sup. Ct. 1910); Ct. 1919).
85 See infra notes 96-111 and accompanying text.
86 See infra notes 89-90 and accompanying text.
87 See e.g., Holyoke, 3 Wash. Terr. 235; Mabie v. Whittaker, 10 Wash. 656 (Sup. Ct. 1895); Marston v. Rue, 92
Wash. 129 (Sup. Ct. 1916); Ostheller, 107 Wash. Terr. at 685.
88 See e.g., Holyoke, 3 Wash. Terr. at 239 (stating, “Management and disposition may be vested in either one or both” spouses, and “[i]f in one, then that one is not thereby made the holder of larger proprietary rights than the other, but is clothed, in addition to his or her proprietary rights, with a bare power in trust for the community.”).
in the property. Thus, upon the death of either spouse, the surviving member of the community took one-half of community income and property by right of survivorship rather than by right of succession, and paid state inheritance tax or federal estate tax, if any, on the portion that passed under the deceased spouse’s will or by intestacy.

Texas and Louisiana practiced yet another brand of community property. In these states, the husband held legal title to community income and property, but the interests of the spouses were beneficially equal. The wife’s interest was vested, but equitable rather than legal. Moreover, if record title to community property was in the wife’s name, the law considered her the legal owner rather than the husband. In either case, whoever enjoyed legal title held the property as well as the other spouse’s interest in the property as trustee. Thus either spouse, as trustee for the community, could convey good title to a bona fide purchaser even in fraud of the other member of the community.

Not all community property laws were created equal. But California’s was the most conspicuous outlier. Unlike the other seven community property regimes, California law embodied reformed common law principles of separate interests more than community property

---

89 See e.g., La Tourette v. La Tourette, 15 Ariz. 200, 208 (Sup. Ct. 1914); In re Williams Estate, 40 Nev. 241 (Sup. Ct. 1916); Ewald v. Hufton, 31 Idaho 373 (Sup. Ct. 1918); Beals v. Ares, 25 N.M. 459 (Sup. Ct. 1919).
90 See e.g., Kohny v. Dunbar, 21 Idaho 258 (Sup. Ct. 1912). By statute, the surviving spouse was heir to the predeceasing spouse. In the event the husband predeceased the wife, her vested interest was freed from the limited control that he exercised over it during marriage.
91 Commentators at the time noted that although Louisiana community property law contained aspects of several U.S. community property regimes, it most closely resembled that of Texas. See Evans, supra note 78, at 63.
92 Burnham v. Hardy Oil Co., 108 Tex. 555 (Sup. Ct. 1917).
94 Compare this to the treatment under California law, where the husband was considered the legal rather than the equitable owner of property even if property was held solely in the wife’s name. See Mitchell v. Moses, 16 Cal. App. 594 (1911).
law principles of shared interests.\textsuperscript{96} It protected the wife by giving her rights to manage her own separate property and to prevent her husband from mismanaging her contingent interests in the community. But it did not make her an immediate co-owner. Because her interests ripened only upon termination of the marriage by death or divorce, the wife resembled an expectant heir rather than an equal partner during the existence of the marriage.

To complicate matters, California community property law suffered from statutory and judicial schizophrenia. By statute, the husband was granted “absolute ownership” of all community income and property\textsuperscript{97} that he was free to manage and control “with the like absolute power of disposition as of his own separate estate.”\textsuperscript{98} Yet his “absolute ownership” did not allow him to defraud his wife of her interest in the community, which, again, only ripened upon dissolution.\textsuperscript{99} If she were merely an expectant heir, with no interest in the community,\textsuperscript{100} how could she also be said to circumscribe her husband’s management of property that by statute he owned absolutely? How, for example, could she prevent him from assigning her contributions to community income?\textsuperscript{101} Or stop him from conveying, selling, leasing, or encumbering the community’s real property?\textsuperscript{102} Or from conveying or encumbering household items without her written consent?\textsuperscript{103} Or from making a gift of community property without valuable consideration \textsuperscript{96} Susan Prager has documented the “constant tension” in California’s community property law “between reformed common law and community property philosophies.” Prager, supra note 74, at 1. Between 1850 and 1891, Prager reports that California community property law functioned “closely akin to that of a common law state which had adopted a married women’s property act...As the husband came to be thought of as full and complete owner of the community property, the wife’s earnings began to be treated as if they were her separate property.” Id. at 46.

\textsuperscript{97} § 172 Cal. Civ. Code, enacted Stats. 1872.

\textsuperscript{98} Act of April 17, 1850, § 9, Cal. Stat. 254.

\textsuperscript{99} See e.g., Beard v. Knox, 5 Cal. 252, 256 (Sup. Ct. 1855); Scott v. Ward, 13 Cal. 458, 469 (Sup. Ct. 1859); Payne v. Payne, 18 Cal. 291, 301 (Sup. Ct. 1860); Lord v. Hough, 43 Cal. 581, 585 (Sup. Ct. 1872).

\textsuperscript{101} Cal. Stat. 1913, at 537 (invalidating assignments of wages or salary of either spouse absent written consent). \textsuperscript{102} Act of May 23, 1917, 583 Cal. Stat. 829-30 (adopting § 172a).

\textsuperscript{103} Act of March 23, 1901, 190 Cal. Stat. 258, p. 598.
or her written consent?[^104] The same statutory framework that granted the husband absolute ownership of community property and that removed from the wife all present interest in the community also provided the wife immediate interests and negative rights that materially qualified the husband’s dominion.^[105]

Not surprisingly, California courts rendered decisions reflecting the statutory contradictions. Charged with determining the nature of the wife’s interest in community property, one line of California Supreme Court cases held that the wife possessed a “mere expectancy” interest,^[106] while another held she possessed an “existing, vested” interest.^[107] The statutes were not solely to blame for the disparate though parallel holdings. Judges reared in the [^104]: Act of March 31, 1891, 220 Cal. Stat. 245 (restricting husband’s absolute management and control of community property).

[^105]: One might even say that the statute provided the wife present and equal ownership interests in community property. See Cal. Civ. Code § 682, enacted Stats. 1872 (“The ownership of property by several persons together is either: 1. Of joint interests; 2. Of partnership interests; 3. Of interests in common; 4. Of community interest of husband and wife.”). Inexplicably, California courts relied infrequently on this statute, and then to deny the wife a present interest in the community. See e.g., Moore v. Neighbours, 95 Cal. App. 628, 631 (1928) (finding although the statute defined “community interest of husband and wife” as implying co-ownership, married women received co-ownership only upon dissolution of the marriage by death or divorce).

[^106]: Van Maren v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 308, 311 (Sup. Ct. 1860) (holding “[t]he interest of the wife is a mere expectancy, like the interest which an heir may possess in the property of his ancestors”); Packard v. Arellanes, 17 Cal. 525, 538 (Sup. Ct. 1866) (“mere expectancy”); In re Roland, 74 Cal. 523, 525-26 (Sup. Ct. 1888) (finding that the “estate in expectancy of the wife in the community property is dependent upon her survivorship; and in the event of her death before her husband, it is deemed never to have existed.” Emphasis in original.); Estate of Burdick, 112 Cal. 387, 393 (Sup. Ct. 1896) (finding the wife takes her interest in community property by succession rather than right of survivorship due to “mere expectancy” interest); Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 344, 347 (Sup. Ct. 1897) (“mere expectancy”); Sharp v. Loupe, 120 Cal. 89, 93 (Sup. Ct. 1898) (wife taking her interest in the community not as survivor or co-owner but as “heir”); Cunha v. Hughes, 122 Cal. 119, 112 (Sup. Ct. 1898) (“by succession” rather than as survivor); Spreckels v. Spreckels, 172 Cal. 775, 780 (Sup. Ct. 1916) (as “heir”); Roberts v. Wehmeyer, 191 Cal. 601, 614 (Sup. Ct. 1923) (wife possess no existing ownership in the community).

[^107]: Beard, 5 Cal. at 256 (Sup. Ct. 1855) (finding spouses “jointly seised of the property,” and wife’s interest as “present, definite, and certain”); Galland v. Galland, 38 Cal. 265, 271 (Sup. Ct. 1869) (finding a wife possessed “a joint and equal interest with the husband in all property acquired during the marriage”); Estate of Buchanan, 8 Cal. 507, 510 (Sup. Ct. 1857) (holding property acquired during marriage “belonged to the community, and upon the death of the husband the widow took one half” as survivor); Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 247, 251 (Sup. Ct. 1859) (finding both spouses “possess an equal right to succeed to the property after dissolution”); Smith v. Smith, 12 Cal. 216, 225 (Sup. Ct. 1859) (emphasizing wife’s “half interest in the common property”); de Godey v. Godey, 39 Cal. 157, 164 (Sup. Ct. 1870) (stating community property “belongs to the matrimonial community, and not less to the wife than to the husband”); Payne, 18 Cal. at 301 (wife possesses an “undivided” interest in the community); King v. La Grange, 50 Cal. 328, 332 (Sup. Ct. 1875) (wife takes possession of her interest as “survivor”); Directors of Fallbrook District v. Abila, 106 Cal. 355, 361-62 (Sup. Ct. 1895) (wife’s interest “no doubt, more tangible” than the right of an expectant heir); Estate of Rossi, 169 Cal. 148, 149 (Sup. Ct. 1915) (wife takes possession of her interest “by virtue of survivorship”); Estate of Brix, 181 Cal. 667, 676 (Sup. Ct. 1919) (finding wife could “be awarded the whole” of community property upon husband’s death, her half plus his).
common law tradition awkwardly grafted foreign property law concepts on California’s civil law system, resulting in imperfect analogies and inconsistent rulings. These jurists were slow to confer equal authority on law developed by legislative grace rather than by judicial deliberation and precedent. They were slower, still, to embrace a property law system that conferred equal rights on married women, and that replaced legal patriarchy with marital co-ownership.

Divining a wife’s property interests in California and elsewhere proved exceedingly difficult. In fact, the same court that termed a wife’s interest “a mere expectancy,” expressed in the very same term “no doubt” that upon a husband’s death, the wife “took one undivided half of the common property in her own right by virtue of the community existing between herself and husband.” Heirs did not usually take by right of survivorship. No wonder the U.S. Attorney 108 See 34 Op. Att’y Gen. 395, 402 (1924) (attributing “confusion in the decisions of the California courts” to “the fact that the courts have been attempting, in their opinions, to apply the terminology of the common law to community property, which embodies a legal concept wholly foreign to the common law, and to which the terminology of the common law cannot be applied with accuracy and precision.”); Robert G. Hooker, Jr., Nature of Wife’s Interest in Community Property in California, 15 CAL. L. REV. 302 (1926-27) (attributing “confusion” to “minds trained to the common law”); Schuele, supra note 72, at 251 (describing “a strong allegiance to Anglo-American common law culture that was quite at odds with the prevailing legal culture”); J. Emmett Sebree, Federal Taxation of Community Property, 12 TEX. L. REV. 273, 275, 281 (1933-34) (stating “the wife’s interest is hard to define in terms of the common law and any theory which regards the interest of the spouses as ‘equal, present, and vested’ is difficult to apply”); William A. Reppy, Jr., Retroactivity of the 1975 California Community Property Reforms, 48 S. CAL. L. REV. 977, 1055-59 (1975) (exploring the inability of common law trained lawyers to comprehend and embrace co-ownership under marital property law).

---

109 In the first U.S. Supreme Court case interpreting community property law, the Court acknowledged the difficulty in applying common law principles to civil law systems. In Warburton v. White, 176 U.S. 484, 494, 497 (1900), involving Washington community property law, the majority wrote that, unlike common law, it was a “misconception” of the civil law system “to suppose that because power was vested in the husband to dispose of the community acquired during marriage, as if it were his own, therefore by law the community property belonged solely to the husband.” The husband was given management and control over marital property “not because he was the exclusive owner, but because by law he was created the agent of community.” In Arnett v. Reade, 220 U.S. 311, 320 (1911), applying New Mexico law, Justice Holmes explained why courts viewed the husband as the sole owner of the community: “The notion may have been helped by the subjection of the woman to marital power…and in this country by confusion between the practical effect of the husband’s power and its legal ground, if not by mistranslation of ambiguous words like domino.”

110 Prager, supra note 74, at 33; Schuele, supra note 77, at 262 (“Legislators appear to have been unable to ignore their common-law heritage and may even have been hostile toward the property rights of married women.”).

111 Payne, 18 CAL. at 301.
General, and members of Congress found community property law difficult to understand. So did judges.

III. CO-OWNERSHIP AND THE TAX CONSEQUENCES OF COMMUNITY PROPERTY LAW

The federal government first examined the nature of a wife’s interest under California community property law in 1920. As part of an effort to crack down on tax avoidance through income shifting arrangements, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue requested an opinion from the Attorney General on the federal tax treatment of income and property reported by spouses living in community property states. In particular, the Commissioner wanted to know, first, whether community property spouses, based on their ownership of community income and property, were permitted to make separate returns reflecting one-half the community income, and, second, whether the gross estate of a decedent spouse in community property states should include “one-half and only one-half of the community property of husband and wife domiciled therein” on the theory that the surviving spouse took the property as co-owner rather than heir.

The Treasury previously examined these questions with respect to Texas community property law, and concluded that Texas spouses could render separate income tax returns reflecting one-half the community’s income from earnings and property, and, furthermore, that a surviving spouse in Texas could be taxed, if at all, on only one-half the gross estate of the decedent spouse, because she already owned the other half. The Attorney General now sought to determine the federal tax treatment of married couples in the remaining seven community property states.

---

112 See infra notes 115-51 and accompanying text.
113 See infra notes 152-59, 198-204 and accompanying text.
114 See infra notes 161-97 and accompanying text.
116 32 Op. Att’y Gen. 298, 307 (1920); T.D. 3071, 3 Cum. Bull. 221 (1920). The opinion concluded that marriage in Texas was a “conjugal partnership” (id. at 302) in which “the earnings of the husband and wife belong to them jointly in equal shares,” and where “the community interest attaches as soon as the right to the wages comes into existence” (id. at 306).
117 See T.D. 2450 (1917).
Ownership interest in income and property determined taxability of these couples, the Attorney General said, and state property law would determine ownership. As early as 1812, the U.S. Supreme Court was “clearly of opinion” that ownership of land “can be acquired and lost only in the manner prescribed by the law of the place where such land is situate[d].”

Moreover, the Court followed “a principle firmly established” that it must look to state law “for the rules which govern [property’s] descent, alienation and transfer, and for the effect and construction of wills and other conveyances.” Also, where state courts “have interpreted state laws governing real property or controlling relations which are essentially of a domestic and state nature,” the Supreme Court would “if it is possible to do so…adopt and follow the settled rule of construction affixed by the state court of last resort to the statutes of the State, and thus conform to the rule of property within the State.”

As such, the government was careful to emphasize that it was conforming to longstanding practice and “adopt[ing] the rules laid down by the highest courts of the various States.”

The Attorney General examined each community property state in turn. In Washington, the wife possessed during “coverture” as well as upon dissolution of the marriage “a vested and definite interest and title in community property, equal in all respects to the interest and title of her husband.” In Arizona, wives enjoyed also “an equal interest” with husbands in community property. According to the Arizona Supreme Court, the law “gives the husband no higher or better title than it gives the wife. It recognizes a marital community wherein both are equal. Its policy plainly expressed is to give the wife in this marital community an equal dignity, and

---

119 Id. at 461-62.
121 De Vaughn v. Hutchinson, 165 U.S. 566, 570 (1897).
122 Warburton v. White, 176 U.S. 484, 496 (1900).
124 Id. at 454.
125 Id. at 438.
makes her an equal factor in matrimonial gains.”¹²⁶ The interest of the wife was “not a mere possibility—not the expectancy of an heir.”¹²⁷ Similarly, the Attorney General found equal ownership interests in the marital communities of Idaho,¹²⁸ Louisiana,¹²⁹ New Mexico,¹³⁰ and Nevada.¹³¹ Only in California did the wife suffer less than co-ownership in community property. Rather than viewing the wife as owner of the community, “the highest courts of that State” held that “during coverture the wife has no vested interest in the community property, her interest therein being a mere expectancy.”¹³² Recent changes to the California statute, the opinion noted, did not alter the wife’s unequal interest in community property.¹³³

The Attorney General concluded that for married residents in community property states except California, “the ownership in one-half of all community property vests in each spouse.”¹³⁴ For federal income tax purposes, spouses in those states could file separate returns each reporting one-half the community income, and for federal estate tax purposes, only one-half of the community property should be included in the decedent’s gross estate.¹³⁵ In other words, equal ownership under community property law was not a tax avoidance device.

A. The Treasury Department and California Tax “Evaders”

Subsequent events in California prompted the federal government to reconsider its 1921 ruling only a few years later. In 1923, the Treasury Department requested the Attorney General to reexamine the nature of a wife’s interest in California as a result of recent amendments to the ¹²⁶ Id., quoting La Tourette v. La Tourette, 15 Ariz. 200, 208 (Sup. Ct. 1914).

¹²⁷ Id.
¹²⁸ Id. at 440.
¹²⁹ Id. at 445.
¹³⁰ Id. at 449.
¹³¹ Id. at 452.
¹³² Id. at 456.
¹³³ The Attorney General found that these amendments failed “to make so revolutionary a change in the existing rule of property in California as to devest [sic] the husband of his ownership in the community property” (id. at 458) or “vest in the wife any interest thereto prior to the dissolution of the community” (id. at 458).
¹³⁴ Id. at 462.
¹³⁵ Id. at 463.
state’s community property statute as well as judicial interpretations finding the wife’s interest in the California community to be greater than a mere expectancy. The Attorney General conducted a careful review of the evolving California community property law from the 1849 Constitution to the latest amendments of the codified statute.

Even just in view of “the restrictions placed on the husband’s control of community property” by recent statutory changes, the Attorney General found it “difficult to see how the judicial mind can conceive of his possessing the elements of absolute ownership over the community estate.”136 It was clear to the Attorney General that the husband’s interest was “only qualified and partial.”137 One line of California decisions may have described the wife as an “heir expectant,” but another “recognized her property interest in community gains.”138 More importantly, the “heir expectant” line of cases got it wrong, according to the Attorney General, particularly given the “numerous amendments” to California’s community property law since 1917 revealing “the intent of the legislature to protect what [those] California decisions had failed to recognize—the vested interest of the wife in community estate.”139

The “expectant heir” line of cases lost further precedential value in light of federal court decisions determining “the real nature of a wife’s interest” in California.140 In Wardell v. Blum, the Ninth Circuit held that a California widow, in the words of the Attorney General, “comes into possession of her half of the community property, not as his heir, but by virtue of her valid

---

137 Id. at 385.
138 Id. at 378.
139 Id. at 379. The California community property statute was “clear, and plainly bottomed upon a recognition of a property interest in the wife.” Id. at 385. Legal scholars agreed with this conclusion. See e.g., Hooker, supra note 108, at 305 (“If the wife can get half the community property on divorce; if she gets that half by operation of law where the decree does not mention the property; if she can revoke a gift even as to specific property; can it be consistently said that she takes as an heir, as one who can be defeated by the merest whim of the ancestor?...An heir has nothing, but a wife has testamentary power.”); Esmond Schapiro, Status of Federal Income and Estate Taxes on Community Property in California, 12 Cal. L. Rev. 99, 100 (1923-24) (arguing that statutory changes left no doubt that the wife’s interest in California community property was fully vested during marriage).
vested interest in the community estate.” The Ninth Circuit further held that recent changes to the California inheritance tax law reflected “manifestly... a clear statutory declaration that the wife’s half of the community property is not part of the property of the deceased husband,” and “even if the case were not controlled by the California statute... applying to it the rule of law announced by the Supreme Court of the United States... the result, it seems to us, must be the same,” namely, “... It is very plain that the wife has a greater interest than the mere possibility of an expectant heir.” The district court had condemned even more strongly the “expectant heir” line of cases. In finding the amendments to the inheritance tax law retroactive, the district court opined, “[I]f that act does not recognize in the wife a valid, subsisting, vested interest and estate in the community property during the life of the husband, language is without meaning and legislation without avail.”

Based on the Blum decision and a thorough review of California community property law, the Attorney General concluded that its 1921 opinion “cannot stand.” It “must be modified to harmonize” with the Blum decision to reflect the “true rule” of law in California that the wife enjoys a greater interest in the community than a mere expectancy, and which “clearly recognize[s] that the wife’s half of community property is not a part of the property of the deceased husband.” The former opinion was thereby amended, approved by the Treasury Department, and incorporated into official field guidance for revenue agents around the country. For both federal income and estate tax purposes, spouses in all eight community 141 Id. at 378. See also Wardell v. Blum, 276 Fed. 226, 228 (9th Cir. 1921), cert. denied, 258 U.S. 617 (1921) (finding “the wife of a decedent acquires upon his death one half of the community property in her own right, and not as heir of her husband”).

145 Id. at 378 and 393.
property states were deemed to own one-half community income and property, and thus permitted to file separate returns each reflecting half the community’s gross income.

Demonstrably chagrined and desiring a different outcome, the Attorney General withdrew its opinion within two months for further consideration.\(^\text{147}\) Several months later it reaffirmed its earlier opinion, but with palpable reluctance. “I am constrained to reestablish and reaffirm that opinion,” the Attorney General concluded.\(^\text{148}\) After “a full review” and “a study of the situation presented by the California decisions including those handed down by the Supreme Court of California since the decision of \textit{Blum v. Wardell},\(^\text{149}\) and considering those principles which must govern the incidence of a Federal taxing statute upon a subject matter which is the creation of State law,” the Attorney General was “unable to find those considerations which would...justify the Government in beginning anew in some other case, a juridical controversy which was litigated to a final conclusion...and in which the Government’s position was fully presented.”\(^\text{150}\) The opinion was limited to the wife’s interest under the federal estate tax, but “express[ed] no opinion with respect to the principles which govern the taxation of income derived from community property.”\(^\text{151}\)

Down but not out, the Treasury Department accepted the reaffirmed ruling with respect to the nature of a California wife’s interest for purposes of the federal estate tax. At the same time, it received permission from the Attorney General to litigate the nature of the wife’s interest for \(^\text{149}\) Two decisions had been handed down by the California Supreme Court since the \textit{Blum} decision, Roberts v. Wehmeyer, 191 Cal. 601, 612 (Sup. Ct. 1923) (finding no retroactive effect to amended statute) and Taylor v. Taylor, 172 Cal. 71 (Sup. Ct. 1923) (holding upon dissolution by divorce and without a property decree the wife becomes owner of one-half the community property as tenant in common with her husband). The Attorney General noted that the two decisions reflected the two disparate lines of cases in California, and that notwithstanding the federal court’s final determination in \textit{Blum}, “[i]f confusion existed before so far as the California decisions are concerned, it is now the more confounded.” \textit{Id.} at 400.

\(^\text{150}\) \textit{Id.} at 404-05.
\(^\text{151}\) \textit{Id.} at 405. The qualified holding raised questions about the authority of guidance issued a few months earlier (see T.D. 3568, supra note 146) directing revenue agents to treat California spouses the same as other community property spouses for purposes of the federal income tax.
purposes of the federal income tax. In a document sent to all revenue agents, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue wrote, “It is the judgment of the Treasury that public interest requires a final determination of the right of the husband and wife each to return separately one-half of the community income.”

The Commissioner expressed “grave doubt” as to the legality of the earlier Treasury decisions “since the husband has complete control of the community income and may dispose of it as he sees fit during his lifetime without the consent of the wife. It is obviously a somewhat strained construction to consider that the husband has received only one-half of his earnings for income tax purposes although he controls for practical purposes the whole.”

The Commissioner was particularly concerned about the tax avoidance opportunities created by the “valuable privilege” of separate filing. If California spouses prevailed in the courts and were found to have a right to file separate returns, the government would already owe significant tax refunds for previous years. Such funds, the Commissioner was quick to point out, would come “out of the taxes collected from citizens of other States” who were unable to take advantage of this tax “privilege.” “In fairness to the country as a whole,” the Treasury Department, in conjunction with the Attorney General, would seek to expedite a case to the Supreme Court for a final, “true” resolution.

IV. THE LEGISLATIVE ATTACK AGAINST THE COMMUNITY PROPERTY TAX LOOPHOLE

The Treasury Department also lobbied Congress that community property law created unjustified tax inequities. The civil law system perpetrated geographic tax discrimination.

---

153 Id. The Commissioner was undeterred by contrary Supreme Court rulings, including Warburton, 176 U.S. at 497 (calling it a “misconception...to suppose that because power was vested in the husband to dispose of the community acquired during marriage, as if it were his own, therefore by law the community property belonged solely to the husband”) and Arnett, 220 U.S. at 320 (finding despite husband’s management powers over community property during marriage, “it is very plain that the wife has a greater interest than the mere possibility of an expectant heir”).
154 T.D. 3670, supra note 152, at 20.
155 Id.
156 Id.
157 Id.
according to the Treasury, by providing tax savings to a minority of husbands and wives in a handful of states. In 1921, the Treasury Department crafted a legislative proposal taxing all marital income to the spouse “having the management and control of the community property.”\textsuperscript{158} The plan targeted spouses in community property states, and effectively prevented them from filing separate income tax returns while leaving married couples in common law states free to file separately or jointly.\textsuperscript{159} As in its earlier rulings on the nature of a wife’s interest in community property, the Treasury proceeded even though the Supreme Court had already ruled that might was not synonymous with right.\textsuperscript{160} The “marked advantage” enjoyed by married residents of community property states, the Senate Finance Committee wrote in its explanation of the Treasury proposal, was inequitable in any event,\textsuperscript{161} and had been condemned by both the Attorney General and the Treasury Department. “Income which in other states is taxed as a unit to the husband,” the Finance Committee said, “is divided between husband and wife in states having community property laws, and surtaxes are correspondingly reduced.”\textsuperscript{162} The proposed change would “restore uniformity of treatment” to married taxpayers nationwide.\textsuperscript{163}

Members of Congress required little convincing that such treatment was unjustified. Most of them viewed community property law as a tax loophole that should be closed. “Why should the husband of a woman in Arizona,” asked Senator Reed Smoot of Utah, “whose wife has no income whatever from property held by her, have a less rate of taxation imposed upon him than a \textsuperscript{159} See id. at 13.

\textsuperscript{160} See supra note 153. The Treasury also ignored the recent ruling in Blum v. Wardell, 270 Fed. 309, 314 (D. Cal. 1920) to which both the Attorney General’s 1921 opinion and the Treasury’s 1921 ruling referred (finding that “the agency of the husband as head of the family is much broader, and his control and dominion over personal property much greater, than in the case of real property; but it has never been supposed, that this difference lessens the estate of the wife in community personal property, or calls for a different rule of succession”).
\textsuperscript{161} S. Rep. No. 67-275, at 14 (1921).
\textsuperscript{162} Id.
\textsuperscript{163} Id. Congressional supporters of the plan also touted its tax equalization effects. See Cong. Rec. (Oct. 1, 1921), at 5914 (statement of Sen. Penrose) (arguing the plan “proposes to place the so-called community property States on an equality with the other States of the Union from the point of view of taxation”).
man in the same position in the State of New York?” Similarly, Senator Boies Penrose of Pennsylvania saw “no reason why the so-called marital community system in Arizona should have a preference in connection with taxation in this relation over Pennsylvania or New York. Certainly all parts of the country ought to be similarly treated.”

Like the Treasury Department, supporters of the management-and-control proposal believed that dominion over marital income and property rather than technical legal title should determine taxability. Suppose a husband and wife own property jointly, suggested Senator James Watson, but the husband exercises the sole management and derives sole use and enjoyment from it. “Having that income,” Watson asked, “should he not pay the tax?” Watson answered his own question: “Ownership has nothing in the world to do with it; it is solely a question of income. The wife does not control the income and the husband has no accounting to make afterwards. He does not account for a dollar.”

The gendered lens of the common law, as much as legislators’ lack of familiarity with the civil law, influenced Congress’s perspective. “The only way” a wife can access her “half” of the marital income, said Senator Smoot, “is to go into court and break the community bond, and in my State the only way the wife can do it is by doing the same thing, by getting a divorce.” In community property states, Smoot opined (albeit inaccurately), the wife had no legal control over marital income. “It is not her income unless she dissolves the community interest. She does not own it; she does not control it; she cannot invest a dollar of it. The husband does that; he receives the income; he has the distribution of it, and he ought to pay the tax.”

165 Id. at 5914 (statement of Sen. Penrose).
166 Id. at 5917 (statement of Sen. Watson).
167 Id. at 5920.
168 Id. at 5920-21.
169 Id.
Even if the husband acted as “trustee” for his wife’s share, as some community property representatives analogized,\textsuperscript{170} he could still be made to pay the entire tax. “I do not think there is any limitation on the right of the Government of the United States,” argued Senator Oscar Underwood, “to tax the property in the hands of the trustee who holds it for somebody else rather than in the hands of the actual owner.”\textsuperscript{171} The trusteeship argument for taxing the husband on only one-half the community income proved as unpersuasive as the partnership argument.\textsuperscript{172} “It is not the same as a partnership at all,” said Senator Smoot.\textsuperscript{173} “If the wife had the right in Louisiana to demand half of all of the gains that are received by the husband and take that money and put it in her own name, and had a right to invest it no matter whether the husband objected or not, then she would control it, and it would be her income.”\textsuperscript{174} But “it is not her income. It is the husband’s income,”\textsuperscript{175} and he should remit the tax.

Community property law did not reflect a more socially progressive property law regime, as its supporters suggested.\textsuperscript{176} Nor was it better aligned than traditional common law with \textsuperscript{170} See id. (Oct. 27, 1921), at 6874 (statement of Sen. Ransdell) (finding “the law merely permits” the husband to act as “trustee” of his wife’s share); Id. (Oct. 1, 1921), at 5918 (statement of Sen. Ashurst) (“It is not his income, it is not his revenue. He only has one half of that and the other half is permitted to remain in his custody provided his spouse is willing for him to invest it in her interest; but he at no time owns that other half.”).

\textsuperscript{171} Id. (Oct. 21, 1921), at 5916, 5919 (statement of Sen. Underwood).
\textsuperscript{172} Community property representatives likened the marital partnership to business partnerships. See CONG. REC. (Oct. 27, 1921), at 6873 (statement of Sen. Ransdell) (reading letter from lawyer constituent saying the “marital community is a partnership” in which spouses “have an equal interest in the profits of the partnership,” such that “Congress can no more force the husband to treat the entire community income as his than it could compel an ordinary commercial partner to return the entire income of the partnership as his own”); Id. (Oct. 1, 1921), at 5918 (statement of Sen. Ashurst) (saying the marital partnership in community property states was “not a fiction,” but “a partnership imposed by law” justifying separate returns each reflecting one-half the partnership’s taxable income).
\textsuperscript{173} CONG. REC. (Oct. 1, 1921), at 5920 (statement of Sen. Smoot).
\textsuperscript{174} Id.
\textsuperscript{175} Id.
\textsuperscript{176} Community property representatives highlighted enlightened aspects of the civil law. See id. (Oct. 1, 1921), at 5915 (statement of Sen. Ashurst) (quoting legal scholar Richard Ballinger as noting the law’s “many commendable features,” including “social advancement” and inevitable influence over the traditional common law, which “can no longer impede the development of a system of laws which yield to the wife, in matters of property, the equality of interest and right with the husband which Christian justice demands”). Under reformed common law, it was less clear whether wives possessed greater or lesser legal interests than wives in community property states. In California during the late 19th century, for instance, “women’s legal status was…worse…than in common law states with political egalitarianism and ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment. ¹⁷⁷ To its critics, it was a tax avoidance device that if left unchecked would grow into a capacious tax loophole. Suppose a state “wanted to extend her community law,” Senator Smoot suggested ominously, by providing “that it shall not only apply to wife and husband but to every child they may have.” ¹⁷⁸ If Congress had to accept each state’s definition of taxable income, “then a State could pass a law claiming not only community privileges for the husband and wife but for every child that was born to the husband and wife.” ¹⁷⁹ Families with six or seven children would be able to divide family income “in such a way that a man could have at least $70,000 or $75,000 of income [$840,000 to $900,000 in 2009 dollars] and never pay a cent of income tax.” ¹⁸⁰ States would seek to benefit their own citizens at the expense of the national government, and tax revenues would shrink dramatically. ¹⁸¹

Defenders of the community property system freely acknowledged its favorable tax effects. But similar tax saving was also available to common law married couples through unrestricted tax avoidance devices. Husband and wives in non-community property states could “execute a partnership agreement embodying the identical principles” of community property law, and thereby “enjoy all the benefits of separate returns for taxation purposes.” ¹⁸² Moreover, to the extent Congress should be concerned about income shifting between spouses, these private law partnerships were considerably more superficial than community partnerships. The partnerships available to common law spouses were voluntary and authorized by a state’s ¹⁷⁷ See CONG. REC. (Oct. 1, 1921), at 5915 (statement of Sen. Ashurst) (arguing civil law states had long guaranteed legal and economic rights for wives in the same spirit as the suffrage movement).

¹⁷⁸ Id., at 5919 (statement of Sen. Smoot).
¹⁷⁹ Id.
¹⁸⁰ Id.
¹⁸¹ See H.R. REP. No. 67-350, supra note 158 at 6 (arguing “excessively high tax rates” encouraged “various methods of tax evasion,” including income shifting under community property law).
¹⁸² CONG. REC. (Oct. 27, 1921), at 6875-76 (statement of Sen. Ransdell).
contract law, while community partnerships were mandatory for all husbands and wives, and carried with them significant legal responsibilities. Community property law imposed “imposes property limitations on the husband in the nature of a marital partnership.”\(^{183}\) In fact, the “burdens and limitations” on the husband “may well be considered sufficient to counterbalance taxation benefits that now exist and certainly justify the recognition of the community system by the Federal Government in its scheme of taxation.”\(^{184}\) Common law husbands paid more tax than community property husbands on equal amounts of income, but they also enjoyed unfettered command over marital property.

Common law husbands reaped additional benefits. In the event of divorce, spouses under community property law split in half marital income and property, while common law husbands could take it all. In addition, a community property wife could “will one-half of the property that may be acquired as a result of the marriage partnership to her twenty-second cousin or to a stranger” without her husband’s permission.\(^{185}\) A common law wife “has no such right, and the husband’s property is subject only to his disposition by will or the law of inheritance of the States.”\(^{186}\) A community property husband, moreover, could not give away his wife’s interest in the community, but a common law husband “is not subject to any limitation.”\(^{187}\) And while a community property husband could not defraud his wife of her interest in the community or act \(^{183}\) Id. at 6876. Community property representatives attributed support for the Treasury’s management and control proposal to confusion over the civil law system. Cong. Rec. (Oct. 1, 1921), at 5915 (statement of Sen. Broussard) (expressing “no doubt” that common law legislators “able lawyers as they are, who have been trained under the common law found this a perplexing subject and their intellects could not at once grasp this puzzling question of community property law”); Cong. Rec. (Oct. 27, 1921), at 6873 (statement of Sen. Ransdell) (stating the “principles which are peculiar to the law of the [community property] States are not so well known or understood by others from the common law States”).

\(^{184}\) Id.

\(^{185}\) Cong. Rec. (Oct. 27, 1921), at 6875 (statement of Sen. Ransdell).

\(^{186}\) Id.

\(^{187}\) Id. at 6876.
as a “reckless and dangerous trustee,” a common law husband could dispose of marital property “by gambling or in as reckless and extravagant manner as he chooses.”

In the end, the management and control plan did not make it into the Revenue Act of 1921. Whether it was the unified effort among community property representatives to educate their common law colleagues on the practical effects of the civil law, embarrassment that the plan contradicted recent advances in women’s legal and political rights, statistics reporting that only a fraction of married taxpayers filed separate income tax returns and that recent tax cuts mitigated the benefits of separate filing, the availability of income-shifting devices for common law spouses, wariness over impinging states’ sovereign power to determine laws of a “domestic nature,” or legitimate concern that the plan was unconstitutional under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment (by taxing one person on the property of another) as well as the uniformity clause pertaining to Congress’ taxing power (by imposing geographic discrimination in applying direct taxes), the Treasury proposal went down to defeat.

---

188 Id.
190 See supra notes 182-88 and accompanying text.
191 See supra notes 177 and accompanying text.
192 See supra note 127-30 and accompanying text.
193 See Revenue Act of 1921, 42 Stat. 227 (1921) (lowering top marginal rate on individuals from 73 to 58 percent).
194 See supra notes 50-54 and accompanying text. See also Stanley S. Surrey, Assignments of Income and Related Devices: Choice of the Taxable Person, 33 COLUM. L. REV. 791, 813-14 (1933) (noting “if it is the declared policy of a state that contractual assignments between spouses are desirable and enforceable, the situation does not differ appreciably from that in community property states”); Notes, Disparity of Federal Tax Incidence Resulting from Division of Income Under Community Property Laws, 40 YALE L. J. 665, 666 (1930-31) (“Where income is derived from property, uniformity in federal revenue exaction is presently possible, since in the non-community states an assignment of such property would effect the same result as in the community-property states.”).
196 See e.g., CONG. REC. (Oct. 1, 1921), at 5918 (statement of Sen. Broussard) (arguing “no man may be required to return property which is not vested in him or does not belong to him, and to pay taxes on it”).
197 See e.g., Id. at 5918-19 (statement of Sen. Underwood) (arguing the bill makes “a distinction as to communities where the civil law prevails and a division of the property under the law rests between the husband and wife. It seems to me that that is a geographical division, and if it be a geographical division then the proposal is unconstitutional.”). This argument would soon prove unavailing. See Florida v. Mellon, 203 U.S. 12, 17 (1927) (“All that the Constitution requires is that the law shall be uniform in the sense that by its provisions the rule of liability shall be the same in all parts of the United States.”).
Undeterred, Secretary Mellon urged Congress to include an identical version of the plan in the Revenue Act of 1924.\textsuperscript{198} The “unfair advantage” enjoyed by residents of community property states “over the citizens of the other states of this country,” Mellon told Congress, cost the Treasury dearly in lost revenues.\textsuperscript{199} Taxing community income “to the spouse having control of the income” would “restore the equality” of taxation nationwide.\textsuperscript{200} Mellon’s management and control plan fared even worse than the 1921 proposal, failing to make it out of committee. The plan increased taxes on married taxpayers in community property states, which conflicted with Congress’ desire for across-the-board rate reduction.\textsuperscript{201} As important, community property representatives mobilized quickly against the plan, marshalling opposition from elected officials, Chambers of Commerce, taxpayer associations, and citizen committees, while bombarding Congress with letters, testimony, and legal briefs.\textsuperscript{202}

Even in defeat, Mellon was steadfast in his desire to end the “unfair advantage” enjoyed by community property taxpayers. He wrote once more to Congress: “There is a serious question in my mind as to whether or not any state, which as by the Sixteenth Amendment granted to the Federal Government the right to levy income taxes, can make the graduated income tax of the \textsuperscript{198} See Revenue Act of 1924, \textit{supra} note 56.

\textsuperscript{199} 67 \textsc{Cong. Rec.} 175-76 (Nov. 10 1923).

\textsuperscript{200} \textit{Id.} The plan would not “restore the equality” among the states, but rather continue allowing common law spouses to file separate returns while preventing community property spouses from doing the same.

\textsuperscript{201} The 1924 law followed the Revenue Act of 1921 by further slashing taxes and lowering the top marginal rate from 58 to 46 percent. \textit{Id.}

Federal Government ineffective by passing a community property law.”

For the time being, however, there was no need for legislative action. The question concerning how to tax spouses in community property states was presently before the Supreme Court in a case originating in California. Perhaps the Court could accomplish what Congress had failed to do: “restore the equality” between taxpayers nationwide.

V. THE SUPREME COURT AND FAMILY TAXATION: DEFINING OWNERSHIP

The Ninth Circuit’s decision in Wardell v. Blum and the Treasury Department’s acquiescence to the holding created a split decision. For estate tax purposes, a California wife possessed a one-half vested interest in community income and property, but for income tax purposes she did not. The U.S. Supreme Court weighed in on the issue with respect to the federal income tax, and ended up accentuating rather than ameliorating the distinction.

In United States v. Robbins, the Court considered for only the fifth time in its history the nature of a wife’s interest under community property law. More importantly, for the first time, it considered the nature of a wife’s interest for purposes of the federal income tax. Writing for the majority, Justice Holmes said that a California wife possessed a “mere expectancy” in the community under the laws of California prior to 1917. As a result, she could not make a separate income tax return reporting one-half the community income. All income of the community was taxable wholly the husband. In so holding, the Court reversed the district court’s lengthy finding 203 Hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee, Revenue Revision, 1925 (1925), at 9.

204 Id.
205 See Wardell v. Blum, 276 Fed. 226 (9th Cir. 1921), supra notes 141-43 and accompanying text.
207 269 U.S. 315 (1926).
208 See Garrozi v. Dastas, 204 U.S. 64 (1907) (holding reasonableness of expenditures made by husband during marriage as manager of the community under Puerto Rico’s community property law was not a question to be decided by the courts); Warburton v. White, 176 U.S. 484, 496 (1900) (holding a Washington wife possessed a present vested interest in community property); Moffitt v. Kelly, 218 U.S. 400 (1910) (holding even if a California wife owned one-half the community property prior to her husband’s the death, the U.S. constitution did not prevent the state from imposing a tax on the wife’s share); Arnett v. Reade, 220 U.S. 311, 320 (1911) (finding a New Mexico wife possessed a present vested interest in community property notwithstanding husband’s management and control over the community). that statutory changes over 25 years had so restricted the rights and powers of the California husband with respect to the community that the wife possessed “a real, substantial, vested, and existing interest,” and that the husband’s dominion over the community was “no broader than it is in some of the other community property states.” Unlike the district court, the Supreme Court conducted a cursory examination of California community property statutes, relied on dated case law, and disregarded subsequent acts of the state legislature expressing its intent to provide vested rights in the wife.

Unlike the district court, the Supreme Court conducted a cursory examination of California community property statutes, relied on dated case law, and disregarded subsequent acts of the state legislature expressing its intent to provide vested rights in the wife.

The holding was a blow to married taxpayers in California. But the dictum was a bombshell for married taxpayers nationwide, particularly those living in community property states. The nature of the wife’s interest as determined by state courts, Holmes wrote, was to be followed “so far as material.” In addition, “Even if we are wrong as to the law of California and assume that the wife had an interest in the community income that Congress could tax if so minded, it does not follow that Congress could not tax the husband for the whole.” If the husband controlled the income, he could be taxed on it regardless of its ownership as determined by state property law. “[H]e alone has the disposition of the fund. He may spend it substantially as he chooses, and if he wastes it in debauchery the wife has no redress…That he may be taxed for such a fund,” Holmes concluded summarily, “seems to us to need no argument.”

---

209 Robbins v. United States, 5 F.2d 690, 697, 702 (N.D. Cal. 1925). See also id. at 705 (“It is the marriage which creates the ownership; death or divorce merely give possession…And the truth and substance is that only one-half of the income really belongs to the husband; the other half, in law and right and justice to the wife.”).

210 The Court relied particularly on Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339 (1897) (holding wife’s interest a mere expectancy, and finding no distinction between community estates and the separate estate of the husband, even subsequent to statutory amendments).

211 Robbins, 269 U.S. at 326.

212 Id. at 327.

213 Id.
Congress,\textsuperscript{214} the Attorney General,\textsuperscript{215} and previous courts\textsuperscript{216} had felt constrained by state law characterizations of ownership in locating “the most obvious target for the shaft.”\textsuperscript{217} The Court had liberated them. Community income could “be in two places at once,”\textsuperscript{218} both “wholly the income of the husband and half the income of the wife.”\textsuperscript{219} In deciding whom to tax, courts now had a choice, because both husband and wife could be said to own rights in community income and the property from which it flowed. If Congress wanted to tax both members of the community as co-owners, then ownership as determined by state statutes and interpreted by state courts could be considered “material.” If, on the other hand, Congress wanted to tax the husband on the entirety of community income and property, then ownership under state law could give way to the husband’s “beneficial interest” where “the possession of power of disposition [became] in and of itself a proper test of income tax liability.”\textsuperscript{220} In other words, income could include “not only property the legal ownership of which is acquired by the taxpayer during the

\textsuperscript{214} In the same year the Court decided \textit{Robbins}, Congress included a provision in the Revenue Act of 1926 indicating that state law was the final arbiter of ownership with respect to marital property. \textit{See} Revenue Act of 1926, ch. 27, § 1212, 44 Stat. 9, 130 (stating where “the wife has a vested interest as distinguished from an expectancy,” income and property should be reported “by the spouse to whom the income belonged under the state law applicable to such marital community for such period.” Emphasis added.).

\textsuperscript{215} \textit{See} 32 Ops. Att’y Gen. at 461, \textit{supra} note 115 (citing to Supreme Court precedent).

\textsuperscript{216} \textit{See supra} notes 120-22, 195, 208 and accompanying text. The Supreme Court had been particularly clear on this subject with respect to determining respective interests of spouses in marital property. \textit{See} Moffitt v. Kelly, 218 U.S. 400, 406 (1910) (finding “the nature and character of the right of the wife in the community for the purpose of taxation was peculiarly a local question which we have no power to review”). When faced with interpreting a state statute or rule of property, however, the Court recognized that if state decisions were in conflict or failed to establish a definitive rule, it could exercise its own judgment. \textit{See e.g.,} Burnet v. Harmel, 287 U.S. 103, 110 (1932) (invalidating state definition of a “lease” as a “sale” with respect to sub-soil rights, and holding “an Act of Congress has its own criteria, irrespective of any particular characterization in the local law”); Burk-Waggner Oil Association v. Hopkins. 269 U.S. 110 (1925) (disregarding state classification of a business enterprise).

\textsuperscript{217} \textit{Robbins}, 269 U.S. at 328.

\textsuperscript{218} \textit{Developments in the Law—Taxation, To Whom Income May Be Taxed}, 47 \textit{Harv. L. Rev.} 1273, 1278 (1933-34) (referring to \textit{Robbins}).

\textsuperscript{220} Maggs, \textit{supra} note 219, at 368. Legal commentators noted the pro-government features of Holmes’ opinion. \textit{See} id. at 366 (arguing the Court’s “position is that the doctrine of those state courts which hold that the wife is co-proprietor of community property with her husband is material, and would be followed by the Supreme Court to the extent of permitting Congress to tax the wife for her interest in the community income; but is not material, and will not be followed, to the extent of preventing Congress from taxing the husband for the whole.”).
tax period,” but “also property, the beneficial ownership of which is thus acquired.” In the end, Robbins highlighted that income and property in a marital partnership could “be taxed to the person who controls them, although he does not own them or the property producing them.” That possibility meant that husbands in all states could be taxed on the whole of marital income, whatever the wife’s interest under state law. It also meant that if the husband could be taxed on the whole under the federal income tax, the same was true under the federal estate tax.

The immediate aftermath of Robbins provided ominous signs for community property spouses. First, the Attorney General announced that it was considering applying Holmes’s dictum to states other than California. To help him better understand the nature of the wife’s interest in community income, he invited community property representatives “to state their views on the subject” and to file briefs. In 1927, the Attorney General issued his opinion on the subject, withdrawing earlier opinions from 1920 and 1921, and concluding that the “problems presented” could not be “settled by any opinion of the Attorney General” nor by congressional action. Instead, he encouraged the Secretary of the Treasury “to arrange for test cases in the courts or otherwise deal with the matter as you may think proper.” In addition, the 221 Maggs, supra note 219, at 441.

---

222 Surrey, supra note 194, at 811.
223 See Donworth, supra note ???, at 159 (querying whether Robbins could be applied to other community property states, and concluding that Holmes’ dictum applied only to California).
224 See Maggs, supra note 219 at 357 (arguing even if the wife received her half of the community upon her husband’s death as survivor rather than heir, “it is doubtful whether any constitutional objection can be urged against a construction of the federal estate tax law which would subject it to the tax”).
225 Donworth, supra note ???, at 164. George Donworth was a Washington lawyer, federal district court judge, founding member of Perkins Coie, and counsel for the taxpayer in Seaborn.
226 Id.
230 Id. at 271. Meanwhile, the Treasury Department’s Division of Tax Research prepared an administrative ruling prohibiting husbands and wives from dividing community income on separate returns. Members of Congress from community property states intervened, and persuaded the Treasury to withhold its ruling pending test cases. See Mr. Tarleau to Mr. Sullivan, Legislative history of the Treasury’s position with respect to compulsory joint returns and community property income (June 10, 1941), OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, available at http://taxhistory.tax.org/Civilization/Documents/marriage/hst28693/28693-1.htm.
Ninth Circuit overturned its earlier holding in Blum, finding that a wife in California took her one-half interest in the community upon the death of her husband as an heir rather than as a survivor, which properly subjected her interest to federal estate taxes. The Ninth Circuit had already followed Robbins in an earlier case finding a California husband taxable on the whole of community income and property, including those portions specifically attributable to his wife’s community earnings. Other courts were also influenced by Robbins in finding that California community property statutes did not vest sufficient interest in the wife to treat her as co-owner of the community during marriage. Indeed, it appeared as if the federal judiciary was inching inexorably towards removing the tax benefits associated with community property law, in California and elsewhere.

A. Control, Beneficial Interests, Enjoyment, and Other Indicia of Ownership

Beneficial interests as well as legal interests evidenced ownership according to the Court. An expansive, dynamic conception of ownership was particularly appropriate if it curbed tax avoidance, a problem to which the Court became increasingly attentive as reports from Treasury and Congress indicated that noncompliance threatened federal receipts. In an opinion authored by Justice Holmes, the Court held in 1918 that stock dividends did not constitute income within contemplation of the federal income tax. Two years later, the Supreme Court reached the same conclusion, but with Holmes dissenting strongly. The earlier decision interpreted a statute that 231 Talcott v. United States, 23 F.2d 897 (9th Cir. 1928), cert. denied, 277 U.S. 604 (1928).

---

232 See Blair v. Roth, 22 F.2d 932 (9th Cir. 1927). See also Belcher v. Comm’r, 11 B.T.A. 1294 (1928) (holding in the absence of an ante-nuptial agreement, the whole of community earnings taxable solely to the husband). But see Harris v. Comm’r, 10 B.T.A. 1374 (1928) (finding a valid written agreement stipulating the wife’s salary as separate property permitted her to report income separately); Randall v. Comm’r, 4 B.T.A. 679 (1926) (holding wife domiciled in California entitled to file a separate income tax return reflecting separate earnings).
233 See e.g., Preston v. Comm’r, 21 B.T.A. 840, 848 (1930) (following Robbins in taxing all community income to husband whose “dominion and control” were not altered by statutory amendments); Hirsch v. United States, 62 F.2d 128 (9th Cir. 1932) (same), cert. den., 53 Sup. Ct. 595 (1933). But see Cutting v. Ryan, 206 Cal. 254, 258 (Sup. Ct. 1929) (finding wife’s interest “vested” under statutory changes).
did not reach the full extent of the Sixteenth Amendment, which should be read, Holmes urged, “in a ‘sense most obvious to the common understanding at the time of its adoption.’”\(^\text{235}\) “The known purpose of this amendment,” he continued, “was to get rid of nice questions as to what might be direct taxes, and I cannot doubt that most people not lawyers would suppose when they voted for it that they put a question like the present to rest.”\(^\text{236}\) Justice Brandeis also reversed course like Holmes, and articulated a considerably more expansive view of taxable income. “In terse, comprehensive language befitting the Constitution, [the people] empowered Congress ‘to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived.’ They intended to include thereby everything which, by reasonable understanding, can fairly be regarded as income.”\(^\text{237}\)

The broad taxing powers of Congress that the Court articulated in Robbins had roots in this earlier jurisprudence. As the Court considered taxpayers’ artful attempts to avoid taxes by shifting legal ownership of income to other individuals and entities, it adopted non-traditional indicia of ownership that went well beyond legal title. Control or power or dominion over income, beneficial interest, equitable interest, and enjoyment of rights constituent of ownership all justified taxability. In crafting an expansive definition of income and its ownership, the Court operated with the “acknowledged purpose of saving the revenue from defeat and preventing tax avoidance.”\(^\text{238}\) Its jurisprudence with respect to trusts and assignments is exemplary.

1. Trusts: Relinquishing Control, Part I

As part of the Revenue Act of 1924, Congress had enacted “revolutionary innovations” to the taxation of trusts,\(^\text{239}\) effectively taxing the grantor of certain trusts on income the grantor never received. One provision taxed the grantor on income from revocable trusts if the grantor retained “the power to revest in himself title to any part of the corpus of the trust,”\textsuperscript{240} while another provision taxed the grantor on trust income which may be distributed to him or accumulated for future distribution to him or used to pay his life insurance premiums.\textsuperscript{241} Commentators at the time observed that the provisions amounted to “a statutory application of the principle of constructive receipt,”\textsuperscript{242} and that they appropriately addressed overaggressive tax avoidance.\textsuperscript{243} Taxpayers, meanwhile, argued that the law was unconstitutional, amounting to a tax on income that was not legally the grantor’s but rather that of the trustee (by virtue of the legal estate) or the beneficiary (by virtue of the equitable interest). The Supreme Court disagreed.

\(^{236}\) Id.

\(^{237}\) Id. at 237.

In Corliss v. Bowers,\textsuperscript{244} the Court considered a revocable trust established by a husband, income payable to the wife, remainders to the children. The trust instrument reserved for the husband the power to revoke, alter, or modify the trust in whole or in part, and he further retained full control over trust investments. Justice Holmes wrote for a unanimous Court. “[T]axation is not so much concerned with the refinements of title as it is with actual command over the property taxed, the actual benefit for which the tax is paid.”\textsuperscript{245} Income “that is subject to a man’s unfettered command,” he concluded, “and that he is free to enjoy at his own option may be taxed to him as his income, whether he sees fit to enjoy it or not.”\textsuperscript{246} Legal commentators praised the decision for “prevent[ing] tax avoidance,”\textsuperscript{247} while others condemned it for violating \textsuperscript{240} Revenue Act of 1924, § 219(g), \textit{supra} note 56, at 277.

\textsuperscript{241} \textit{Id.}, § 219(h).
\textsuperscript{242} Roswell F. Magill, \textit{The Taxation of Unrealized Income}, 39 HARV. L. REV. 82, 98 (1925-26).
\textsuperscript{243} See Magill, \textit{supra} note 239, at 860-61 (opining the Treasury was appropriately “seeking to prevent evasion” in cases where the taxpayer maintains control over income or property “whether he exercises it or not”).
\textsuperscript{244} Corliss v. Bowers, 281 U.S. 376 (1930).
\textsuperscript{245} \textit{Id.} at 377.
\textsuperscript{246} \textit{Id.} at 378.
\textsuperscript{247} Recent Cases, \textit{Taxation—Income Tax—Transfer of Right to Future Income—Revocable Trust Taxable to Settlor}, 15 MINN. L. REV. 129, 130 (1930-31). See also Notes, \textit{Tax Dodging by the Assignment of Future Income}, 40 YALE L. J. 661, 665 (1930-31) (calling the decision “indicative of a tendency of the federal courts to nullify devices the taxpayer’s due process by taxing him on another’s income. But the case was a relatively easy one for the Court in that it involved an unconditional power of revocation in the grantor, evincing “unfettered command” over income. The harder cases involved situations “where the command was fettered.” Here, too, the Court acted boldly.

In Reinecke v. Smith, a grantor husband created trusts for the benefit of his wife and children. The trustees were the settler, one of his sons (also the direct beneficiary of one trust and contingent beneficiary of the others), and a bank. Each trust authorized the settler to revoke it with the consent of one additional trustee. The Court held the settler taxable on the trust income. “To tax the income of such a trust to the grantor while he and the trustee jointly retain the power to revoke or modify the trust,” Justice Jackson wrote for another unanimous Court, “is consistent with the Fifth Amendment, and helps to make the income tax system complete and consistent and prevent evasions.” Trustees owed a duty to manage trusts faithfully, but they were under no duty to resist alteration or revocation of the trust. In the case at hand, moreover, the grantor’s command was only restricted by receiving consent from one of two people, neither of whom possessed an interest to withhold consent. “A contrary decision would make evasion of the tax a simple matter,” the Court said. “[I]t would be easy to select a friend or relative as co-holder of such a power and so place large amounts of principal and income accruing therefrom beyond the reach of taxation upon the grantor while he retained to all intents and purposes control of

---

248 See Recent Cases, supra note 247, at 441.
249 Surrey, supra note 194, at 819.
250 289 U.S. 172 (1933).
251 Id. at 177.
252 Id. at 178.
both.\textsuperscript{253} Congress reached a similar conclusion the previous year when it indicated that a grantor with power to revest title to any part of the trust corpus, “either alone or in conjunction with any person not having a \textit{substantial adverse interest}” was required to include all trust income as his own.\textsuperscript{254} Congress’s power was not unlimited.\textsuperscript{255} But where the taxpayer “retains for himself so many of the attributes of ownership,” he could not claim to be “the victim of despotic power when for the purpose of taxation he is treated as owner altogether.”\textsuperscript{256}

But what if the taxpayer retained no attributes of ownership? That is, what if the proceeds of a trust, revocable or irrevocable, went to named beneficiaries and the taxpayer retained no power to change the designation of the beneficiaries, revoke the trust, or in any way exercise control over the trust? The taxpayer could still be subject to taxation if he received the beneficial use of the income. In such a situation, the Supreme Court required a grantor to include in his taxable income the portion of trust income applied to the payment of premiums on life insurance policies for his benefit.\textsuperscript{257} In \textit{Burnet v. Wells}, the Supreme Court found that “[l]iability does not have to rest upon the enjoyment by the taxpayer of all the privileges and benefits enjoyed by the most favored owner at a given time or place,” nor was the government “in casting about for proper subjects of taxation…confined by the traditional classification of interests or estates.”\textsuperscript{258} Indeed, according to the Court, Congress “may tax not only ownership, but any right or privilege that is a constituent of ownership. Liability may rest upon the enjoyment by the taxpayer of privileges and benefits so substantial and important as to make it reasonable and just to deal with

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{253} Id.
\textsuperscript{254} Revenue Act of 1932, §§ 166, 47 Stat. 169, 221 (1932) (emphasis added).
\textsuperscript{255} See Reinecke v. Northern Trust Co., 278 U.S. 339 (1929) (invalidating estate tax levy where grantor’s power to revoke was dependent on the acquiescence of a trust beneficiary who possessed an adverse interest).
\textsuperscript{256} Du Pont v. Comm’r, 289 U.S. 685, 689 (1933).
\textsuperscript{257} Burnet v. Wells, 289 U.S. 670 (1933) (upholding § 219(h) of the Revenue Acts of 1924 and 1926).
\textsuperscript{258} Id. at 678.
\end{flushright}
him as if he were the owner, and to tax him on that basis.”259 If a taxpayer enjoyed significant enough privileges and benefits from the disposition of income, it was “reasonable to treat the taxpayer as if he had ownership of the income or an equivalent of ownership.”260 The value and power associated with disposing of income was tantamount to ownership.

2. Assignments: Relinquishing Control, Part II

The Supreme Court’s treatment of assignments of income and property paralleled that of its trust jurisprudence. As with trusts, when future payments were assigned, “the assignor is merely exercising in advance his control over them,”261 and “the enjoyment and benefit derived by a person from the payments to an intended beneficiary is taxable income” to the assignor. The taxpayer is treated as having constructively received the assigned income, and taxed as if he had actually received it. “This constructive receipt is just as effective for tax purposes as actual receipt of the income by the assignor.”262 Also as with trusts, the Court’s approach to the cases involved its “fear of tax avoidance.”263 The Court inquired as to whether “a sufficient quantum of rights has flowed from assignor to assignee to bring about a shift in the taxable person.”264

This inquiry was particularly difficult in the context of the family, where “the intimate relations of husband and wife sometimes enable the consummation of transactions perfect in form, but wholly lacking in substance.”265 The Court was aware of the heightened opportunity to

259 Id. at 678-79.
260 Developments in the Law, supra note 218, at 1277. Similarly, if a husband created a trust for the benefit of his wife pursuant to a separation agreement or to enable the wife to pay household expenses during marriage, the husband was taxable as a beneficiary of the trust in satisfaction of a legal obligation. See Turner v. Comm’r, 28 B.T.A. 91 (1933); Welch v. Comm’r, 12 B.T.A. 800 (1928); Van Brunt v. Comm’r, 11 B.T.A. 406 (1928).
261 Surrey, supra note 194, at 828.
262 Paul and Havens, supra note 238, at 244 (emphasis in original).
263 Surrey, supra note 194, at 793. Decisions, Taxation—Income Tax—Partnership of Husband and Wife, 32 COLUM. L. REV. 1080, 1081 (1932) (observing assignment cases “have probably been conditioned by their background of bad faith”).
264 Surrey, supra note 194, at 796.
265 Paul and Havens, supra note 238, at 255. “Bed chamber’ arrangements,” Paul and Havens observed, “are difficult to prove or disprove, and diligence is necessary where tax avoidance is easy.” Id. at 264.
avoid tax.266 A disproportionate number of assignment cases involved intrafamily transactions, including assignments of partnership interests,267 trust estates,268 rents,269 securities,270 and commissions on insurance premiums.271 And while ownership of income continued to determine taxability, the rule did not necessarily mean that “rights will not be contrasted and balanced, and income allocated on vague principles of equity and fairness.”272 State law continued to define property as well as who owned it, but federal law determined its taxability. As the Supreme Court phrased it in Burnet v. Harmel, “The state law creates legal interests, but the federal statute determines when and how they shall be taxed.”273 In rendering decisions in the assignment cases, the Supreme Court continued to embrace incidents of ownership broader than those recognized by the states. In the process, it also continued to embrace Congress’s broad taxing powers.

In Burnet v. Leininger, the Court held that an assignment of partnership interests from a husband to wife without a change in partnership documents or ownership interests did not defeat taxation of the husband on distributed partnership earnings.274 In language reminiscent of Robbins’ that Congress could levy tax on the basis of control, a unanimous Court said, “If it be 266 See Burnet v. Wells, 289 U.S. 670, 677 (1933) (observing that the “solidarity of the family is to make it possible for the taxpayer to surrender title to another and to keep dominion for himself, or if not technical dominion, at least the substance of enjoyment”); Kunau v. Comm’r, 27 B.T.A. 509, 512 (1933) (recognizing “the necessity for close scrutiny of transactions between persons related by blood, marriage, or community of interest in order to be sure that their dealings are in fact what they, on face, purport to be as to their validity, effect and finality”).

267 See e.g., Balkwill v. Comm’r, 77 F.2d 569 (6th Cir. 1935) (holding assignor partner-sibling taxable rather than assignee brothers and sisters), cert. denied, 296 U.S. 674 (1935); Rosevear v. Comm’r, 31 B.T.A. 146 (1934) (holding assignor husband-partner taxable on distributed earnings rather than assignee wife).
268 See e.g., Brewster v. United States, 9 F.Supp. 686 (Cl. Ct. 1935) (holding assignor sibling taxable rather assignee sibling); McDonald v. Helvering, 74 F.2d 1005 (D.C. Cir. 1934) (same, assignor husband/assignee wife).
269 Bing v. Bowers, 22 F.2d 450 (S.D.N.Y 1928), aff’d 26 F.2d 1017 (2d Cir. 1928) (holding assignor son taxable rather than assignee mother); Woods v. Comm’r, 5 B.T.A. 413, 416 (1926) (holding assignor father-husband taxable rather than assignees wife and daughter).
271 Parker v. Routzahn, 56 F.2d 730 (6th Cir. 1932) (holding assignor husband taxable on future commissions rather than assignee wife), cert denied, 287 U.S. 606 (1932); Bishop v. Comm’r, 54 F.2d 298 (7th Cir. 1931) (same).
272 Surrey, supra note 194, at 796.
273 287 U.S. 103, 110 (1932).
274 285 U.S. 136 (1932). But see Rose v. Comm’r, 65 F.2d 616, 617 (6th Cir. 1933) (holding declaration of a trust of partnership interests and properties sufficient to relieve the partner husband-father from tax on grounds that trustee family members received “rights of partners”).
assumed that Mrs. Leininger became the beneficial owner of one-half of the income which her husband received from the firm enterprise, it is still true that he, and not she, was the member of the firm and that she only had a derivative interest.”

Assigning his partnership interest was not the same as transferring “the corpus of the partnership property to a new firm with a consequent readjustment of rights in that property and management.” As legal commentators noted at the time, a partner must transfer “a ‘share’ in the partnership as well as profits earned upon such share” to avoid tax. Assignment of “profits” alone did not relieve the assignor of the tax, nor did merely assigning “interest” in the firm. Similarly, assignment of unearned future income, by itself, did not free the assignor from tax on that income, nor did an assignment of income already earned. Control of income and its taxability involved both “the right to demand or obtain the income and the right to control it after it has been received.” If the assignor retained both these rights, he was taxable on the income when it accrued. Conversely, if the assignor relinquished both rights in an irrevocable assignment, he was no longer taxable on the income.

More than anything, an effective assignment required the assignor to relinquish control, not only over the income stream, but over the source of the income and any beneficial enjoyment.
over the income.\textsuperscript{285} Thus, taxpayers could not assign income from a spendthrift trust, because, by law, they never controlled either the income or the trust corpus.\textsuperscript{286} An effective assignment of profits from the sale of property required relinquishing control over the entire property prior to the sale.\textsuperscript{287} An assignor had to assign the contract and not just income from the contract.\textsuperscript{288} He had to transfer the corpus (i.e., tangible property),\textsuperscript{289} a property right (i.e., covering contract rights broader than property transfers),\textsuperscript{290} more than a mere promise,\textsuperscript{291} and a right to collect income as well as to exercise interest in the property generating the income.\textsuperscript{292} If the assignor failed to divest himself of all legal, equitable, and beneficial interests in income and its sources, he still enjoyed sufficient control to justify taxing him on the subject of the assignment.

3. Income as Consumption and Control as Ownership

By viewing control as tantamount to ownership, the Court defined the reach of the income tax that resembled a consumption tax. Cases like \textit{Burnet v. Wells},\textsuperscript{293} \textit{Reinecke v. Smith},\textsuperscript{294}

\textsuperscript{285} See \textit{e.g.}, Comm’r v. Field, 42 F.2d 820 (2d Cir. 1930) (holding assignor husband not taxable on assignment of trust income to beneficiary wife on grounds he effectively transferred his equitable estate); Clark v. Comm’r, 16 B.T.A. 453 (1929) (holding assignment alienating equitable life interest as a valid transfer of present property right to assignees sufficient to make them taxable on future income).

\textsuperscript{286} See \textit{e.g.}, Comm’r v. Blair, 60 F.2d 340 (7th Cir. 1932) (holding beneficiary of spendthrift trust taxable on assignments of trust income).

\textsuperscript{287} See \textit{e.g.}, Wright v. Comm’r, 26 B.T.A. 21 (1932) (holding assignee taxable on pre-sale transfer of an undivided one-half interest in property); Rogers v. Comm’r, 15 B.T.A. 638 (1929) (holding assignor taxable on profits from sale of property assigned after sale transaction); Walker v. Comm’r, 6 B.T.A. 1142 (1927) (holding assignment of oil and gas lease from husband to wife an effective transfer of the husband’s interest).

\textsuperscript{289} See e.g., Van Brunt v. Comm’r, 11 B.T.A. 406 (1928) (assigning rental and dividend income from property not corpus); Parshall v. Comm’r, 7 B.T.A. 318 (1927) (holding husband’s transfer of partnership interest to wife sufficient to make subsequent partnership distribution taxable to her).

\textsuperscript{290} See \textit{e.g.}, Leydig v. Comm’r, 15 B.T.A. 124, 132 (1929) (finding “where the thing assigned was a property right, real or personal, productive of income, income thereafter arising from such property is income to the assignee by virtue of his ownership”).

\textsuperscript{291} See \textit{e.g.}, Bing v. Bowers, 22 F.2d 450 (S.D.N.Y 1928) (emphasizing the difference between a mere promise to pay and an effective transfer of a property right); Colbert v. Comm’r, 12 B.T.A. 565 (1928) (same).

\textsuperscript{292} See \textit{e.g.}, Rose v. Comm’r, 65 F.2d 616, 617 (6th Cir. 1933) (finding assignment from husband-partner to assignee family members transferred right to partnership income as well as “rights of partners”); Parshall, 7 B.T.A. 318, \textit{supra} note 289 (finding assignee wife received right to partnership income as well as partnership interests).

\textsuperscript{293} 289 U.S. 670 (1933).

\textsuperscript{294} 289 U.S. 172 (1933).
and Burnet v. Leininger all moved the income tax “close to a ‘services’ or ‘flow of satisfactions’ concept of income—the enjoyment and benefit derived by a person from the payments to an intended beneficiary is taxable income to the former.” Taxable income under this theory tracked not only increases and decreases in wealth but also increases and decreases in the value of personal satisfaction. In many ways, the Court’s expanding conception of income resembled what modern-day theorists would recognize as the Haig-Simons definition. Named for its two most influential proponents, economists Robert Haig and Henry Simons, the definition considered income as the algebraic sum of “the market value of rights exercised in consumption and the change in the value of the store of property rights.” Personal income, Simons wrote more pointedly, “connotes, broadly, the exercise of control over the use of society’s scarce resources.”

Some commentators at the time expressed concern that this “broad and convenient formula” for income could “dangerously stimulate the appetite and imagination of hungry income tax collectors.” Several members of the Supreme Court were similarly worried that a definition of taxable income untethered to ownership as defined by legal title inappropriately broadened the powers of taxation. Justice Sutherland, for one, opined that taxing a grantor “requires something more tangible than a purpose to perform a social duty, or the recognition of a moral claim as distinguished from a legal obligation, which, we think, is not supplied by an

---

295 289 U.S. 685, 689 (1933).
297 See Paul and Havens, supra note ???, at 238 (writing “this new development of constructive or equivalent-of-cash income is but a short step to the ‘flow-of-satisfaction’ concept of income, to the doctrine that personal satisfaction is alone sufficient to constitute the equivalent of cash”).
300 SIMONS, supra note 299, at 49.
301 Paul and Havens, supra note 238, at 253.
assumption of his desire thereby to secure his own peace of mind and happiness or relieve himself from further concern in the matter.”

While Congress enjoyed broad taxing powers, “the distinction between taxation and confiscation must still be observed.” In its zeal to protect the revenue, had the Court blurred the line?

A definition of income that equated control with ownership raised a constitutional concern involving due process under the Fifth Amendment. In the words of Justice Sutherland, “So long as the Fifth Amendment remains unrepealed and is permitted to control, Congress may not tax the property of A as the property of B, or the income of A as the income of B” on grounds that B controls A’s property or income. The Supreme Court first considered this issue under the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Fifth Amendment. In Hoeper v. Tax Commission, a married taxpayer protested taxes paid under the Wisconsin state income tax, which computed tax liability by aggregating spouses’ incomes on a single return. A divided Court struck down the Wisconsin statute on grounds that the husband had no legal interest in his wife’s income nor did he control it under the state’s reformed common law. “We have no doubt,” the Court held, “that, because of the fundamental conceptions which underlie our system, any attempt by a state to measure the tax on one person’s property or income by reference to the property or income of another is contrary to due process of law as guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. That which is not in fact the taxpayer’s income cannot be made such by calling it income.” The Court applied the same reasoning to a case arising under the Fifth Amendment, finding that both “in law and in fact the wife’s income was her separate property,” a separation 302 289 U.S. 670, 683 (1933) (Sutherland, J. dissenting).

---

303 Id.
304 Id.
305 Id.
306 Id. at 215.
of interests which prevented the government from taxing her income as her husband’s.
Without legal title or control over the wife’s income, it could not be said that the husband owned in any sense—legal, equitable, beneficial—a taxable property right.

Three dissenting justices in Hoeper saw control where state law did not. “Taxation may consider not only command over but actual enjoyment of the property taxed,” Justice Holmes wrote for himself, Brandeis, and Stone. “In some States, if not in all, the husband became the owner of the wife’s chattels, on marriage, without any trouble from the Constitution; and it would require ingenious argument to show that there might not be a return to the law as it was in 1800. It is all a matter of statute. But for statute,” he said, “the income taxed would belong to the husband, and there would be no question about it.” The majority’s emphasis on “separation of interests” as between the spouses “cannot make us deaf to the assumption...of community when two spouses live together and when usually each would get the benefit of the income of each without inquiry into the source.” Regardless of the spouses’ statutory interests under Wisconsin’s or any other state’s property law, husbands and wives operated as a family unit and benefitted from each other’s income. The reality of that shared enjoyment and use justified taxing combined family income to either spouse. Under the prevailing gendered view of the family and its common law roots, the husband should bear the burden. Taxing combined family 307 Heiner v. Donnan, 285 U.S. 312, 326 (1932) (invoking the federal gift tax and finding “the situation presented in the Hoeper case...the same as that presented here”).

308 Hoeper, 284 U.S. at 220 (Holmes, J., dissenting).
309 Id. at 219.
310 Id. at 219-20.
311 See Recent Decisions, Taxation—Power to Determine Income Tax Rate of Husband on Basis of Combined Income of Husband and Wife, 30 Mich. L. Rev. 810, 811 (1931-32) (observing in the context of Hoeper the “family continues to operate as a unit and the property and income of all its members are still pooled for the benefit of all, regardless of where the legal title stands”). Other commentators argued that taxing someone on the income of another was justified under a control theory or constructive receipt. See Magill, supra note 239, at 860-61. Still others noted “[t]here would seem to be no constitutional objections to taxing the use of income rather than the income itself.” Recent Cases, Federal Taxation of Income as Affected by Community Ownership, 39 Harv. L. Rev. 762, 765 (1925-26).
income was also justified “by its tendency to prevent tax evasion.” 312 Although “the law and the evil” had to share a just and reasonable relation to pass constitutional muster, the Court had regularly held “that administrative necessity may justify the inclusion of innocent objects or transactions within a prohibited class.” 313 Preventing tax avoidance and accounting for the realities of family economics justified aggregating family income and taxing it as a unit.

VI. Poe v. Seaborn: Ownership under State Property Law Equals Taxability

Holmes’ expansive definition of income went on trial in 1930. Three years earlier, the Attorney General had encouraged the Treasury Department “to arrange for test cases in the courts” to determine the nature of the wife’s interest under community property law and to further determine the proper tax treatment of that interest. 314 By 1930, test cases had percolated up to the highest court.

In the lead case, Poe v. Seaborn, 315 the Supreme Court interpreted the Revenue Act of 1926 as applied to the interests of husband and wife in community property under the law of Washington. The opinion, authored by Justice Roberts, challenged definitions of taxable income deviating from strict legal title. The relevant federal income tax provisions “lay a tax upon the net income of every individual,” and “use of the word ‘of’ denotes ownership. It would be a strained construction, which, in the absence of further definition by Congress, should impute a broader significance to the phrase.” 316 The wife’s ownership interest in community property, in turn, “must be found in the provisions of the law of the State.” 317 According to the government, the husband under Washington law enjoyed “such broad powers of control and alienation, that 312 284 U.S. at 220.

---

313 Id. at 220-21.
314 Supra note 230 and accompanying text.
316 Id. at 109.
317 Id. at 110.
while the community lasts, he is essentially the owner of the whole community property, and ought so to be considered” for tax purposes.\textsuperscript{318} The Court disagreed, finding that while the husband was relegated powers of management and control over community personal property, his power was “subject to restrictions which are inconsistent with denial of the wife’s interest as co-owner.”\textsuperscript{319} The “community must act through an agent,” not just to discourage litigation between spouses which might “subvert the marital relation,” but also to protect the reliance and expectancy interests of third parties dealing with one or the other spouse.\textsuperscript{320} Most importantly, a careful review of Washington’s community property statutes and state decisions interpreting them indicated that the wife possessed a “clear” and “vested property right in the community property, equal with that of her husband.”\textsuperscript{321}

The Court’s decision was a definitive blow to the position that control determined ownership. “Power is not synonymous with right,” the opinion held.\textsuperscript{322} Control could be indicative of ownership but not determinative. In fact, under Washington law, the husband’s control as managing agent of the community “was but a recognition of the ownership of another.”\textsuperscript{323} “The law’s investiture of the husband with broad powers, by no means, negatives the wife’s present interest as co-owner.”\textsuperscript{324} Under the law of Washington, “the entire property and income of the community can no more be said to be that of the husband than it could rightly be termed that of the wife.”\textsuperscript{325} Thus, married couples in Washington could file separate returns, “each treating one-half of the community income as his or her respective income.”\textsuperscript{326}

\textsuperscript{318} Id. at 111-12.
\textsuperscript{319} Id.
\textsuperscript{320} Id. at 112.
\textsuperscript{321} Id. at 111.
\textsuperscript{322} Id. at 113.
\textsuperscript{323} Surrey, supra note 194, at 828.
\textsuperscript{324} 282 U.S. at 113.
\textsuperscript{325} Id.
\textsuperscript{326} Id. at 118.
The Court held similarly in the companion cases accompanying Seaborn. It found that the community property laws of Arizona,\(^{327}\) Louisiana,\(^{328}\) and Texas\(^{329}\) granted wives in those states present vested interests equal to their husbands in one-half the community income and property. The equal ownership interests between spouses in those states permitted them to file separate federal income tax returns each with one-half the community income.

In addition, by way of certificate from the Ninth Circuit, the Court revisited the nature of the wife’s interest under California community property law. In United States v. Malcolm,\(^{330}\) the Court considered two questions: (i) under the federal income tax, “must the entire community income of a husband and wife domiciled in California be returned and the income tax thereon be paid by the husband?”; and (ii) did a wife in California possess “such an interest in the community income that she should separately report and pay tax on one-half of such income?”\(^{331}\) California law had changed since the Court last considered these questions. Prompted by the adverse decisions in Robbins\(^{332}\) and Stewart v. Stewart,\(^{333}\) the California legislature had enacted a statute identifying the “respective interests of husband and wife in community property” during marriage as “present, existing, and equal.”\(^{334}\) The Supreme Court considered the above questions in light of the legislative declaration.\(^{335}\) Citing Seaborn and its companion cases, the Malcolm Court found, first, that a California husband did not have to report the entire community income on his own return, and second, that a California wife possessed sufficient interest in the \(^{327}\) See Goodell v. Koch, 282 U.S. 118, 121 (1930).

---

\(^{328}\) See Bender v. Pfaff, 282 U.S. 127, 131 (1930).

\(^{331}\) Id at 793.

\(^{332}\) 269 U.S. 315 (1926).

\(^{333}\) Stewart v. Stewart, 199 Cal. 318, 339 (1926) (concluding the legislature “did not state…‘in plain language’ that ‘the purpose of these amendments was to vest in the wife during the marriage a present interest or estate in the community property’”).

\(^{335}\) Some commentators argued that the 1927 amendments simply clarified longstanding policy and law. See e.g., Recent Legislation, Community Property, 16 CAL. L. REV. 68, 68 (1927).
community to report one-half the community income on a return separate from her husband’s.\textsuperscript{336} Shortly thereafter, the Treasury Department issued a ruling that applied the holdings in \textit{Seaborn}, \textit{Malcolm}, and the companion cases to the remaining three community property states of Idaho, Nevada, and New Mexico.\textsuperscript{337} By the close of 1931, married couples residing in all eight community property states reported income for federal income tax purposes as co-owners of marital income and property.

****

In the same year that the Supreme Court decided \textit{Seaborn}, it heard another seminal tax case, \textit{Lucas v. Earl}.\textsuperscript{338} Both cases involved the taxation of married couples living in community property states. But while the Washington spouses in \textit{Seaborn} were found to share equal ownership interests in the community and therefore allowed to file separate federal income tax returns, the Earls, residents of California, were not. In 1901, Mr. and Mrs. Earl contracted to divide equally all present and future income and property. Thirty years later, the Court considered the tax implications of Mr. Earl’s contractual assignment of personal service income to his wife. Justice Holmes wrote for a unanimous Court, holding that the assignment did not relieve Mr. Earl of his responsibility to pay tax on the whole of his income. In language reminiscent of \textit{Corliss}’ “refinements of title,”\textsuperscript{339} Holmes said that the case was “not to be decided by attenuated subtleties.”\textsuperscript{340} Rather, “[i]t turns on the import and reasonable construction of the taxing act. There is no doubt that the statute could tax salaries to those who earned them and provide that the tax could not be escaped by anticipatory arrangements and contracts however \textsuperscript{336} \textit{Malcolm}, 282 U.S. at 794.

\textsuperscript{337} \textit{INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE, INTERNAL REVENUE BULLETIN, MIMEOGRAPH 3853 139-40} Cumulative Bulletin X, pt. 1.
\textsuperscript{338} \textit{Lucas v. Earl, 281 U.S. 111} (1930).
\textsuperscript{339} \textit{Supra} note 245 and accompanying text.
\textsuperscript{340} \textit{Earl, 281 U.S.} at 114.
skillfully devised to prevent the salary when paid from vesting even for a second in the man who earned it.”

Holmes concluded famously: “[N]o distinction can be taken according to the motives leading to the arrangement by which the fruits are attributed to a different tree from that on which they grew.” Artifice did not relieve the owner of income from his tax obligations.

Legal commentators at the time debated whether the Court’s subsequent decision in Seaborn overruled Earl. But the Court itself distinguished the cases. “The very assignment in [Earl],” the Court wrote in Seaborn, “was bottomed on the fact that the earnings would be the husband’s property, else there would have been nothing on which it could operate. That case presents quite a different question from this, because here, by law, the earnings are never the property of the husband, but that of the community.” In other words, Earl was not a community property case, but rather a contract case. In the context of contract law, the tree which bore the fruit was Mr. Earl, while in the context of community property law, the tree was the community, comprised equally of husband and wife. Earl stands for the proposition that one cannot assign income to a third party who does not already own the income and expect to avoid tax. Seaborn, on the other hand, says that husbands in community property states own just one-half the community income in the first place, and thus owe tax only on their respective halves. I tell my students to think of it like this: in Earl, one hundred percent of family income flowed from Mr. Earl’s employer to Mr. Earl and then, a nanosecond later by virtue of state contract law, fifty percent of the income passed to Mrs. Earl; comparatively, in Seaborn, and by virtue of general property law rather than private contract law, one hundred percent of the income flowed to the community in which both Mr. and Mrs. Seaborn enjoyed equal, fifty-percent ownership.

341 Id. at 114-115
342 Id. at 115.
343 See e.g., Surrey, supra note 194, at 813 (“As far as community property is concerned, Lucas v. Earl has been overruled by Poe v. Seaborn.”).
interests. Ownership in Seaborn “spring[ing] by operation of law,” while that in Earl was created “by agreement of the parties.”

One could argue this view amounts to a distinction without a difference. That is, whether by operation of law or by private agreement, both shift ownership of income and property, both are initiated voluntarily by the parties, and both, if validated, result in lower tax liability. The Supreme Court, however, viewed the distinction between income shifting by general law versus private law as real. Moreover, the difference had nothing to do with whether a marriage contract was more or less sacred than contracts governing market-based transactions. It involved ownership, and it applied as equally to community income as to separate income, to community property spouses as to common law spouses. Husbands and wives in community property states were co-owners of the community, but they enjoyed distinct ownership interests, as distinct and separate as the ownership interests of husbands and wives in common law states.

As Randolph Paul, the primary “architect of the modern federal tax system,” wrote in the aftermath of Seaborn, “For income tax purposes a husband and wife are, generally speaking, separate persons. This is true in community property states, and is equally true in non-community property states.” Thus, income shifting by private contract, in both community property and common law states, reshuffled ownership interests and qualified as a taxable event. Income shifting by community property law, from husband to wife or from wife to husband, did not reshuffle ownership interests nor constitute a taxable event, because neither husband nor wife had more than one-half of the whole to shift. In Seaborn, the Court acknowledged this 346 See e.g., Surrey, supra note 194, at 813 (noting Seaborn “interposes the community ownership between the salary and the earner, so that the salary is diverted to the community. It may be urged that an assignment creating enforceable rights in the assignee to the assignor’s salary should similarly be interposed between the earner and his salary.”).

---

348 Paul & Havens, supra note 238, at 243.
fundamental characteristic of community property law and of family taxation. In no uncertain terms, it held that ownership was the lodestar of family taxability.

VII. FROM LODESTAR TO LEGAL FICTION

In the aftermath of Seaborn, family tax issues did not disappear from the Court’s docket. Nor did taxpayers slacken their solicitude for tax saving devices. In fact, the stakes for achieving tax avoidance went up nearly every year in the period between Seaborn and the end of World War II. The Revenue Act of 1932 raised the top marginal income tax rate from 25 to 63 percent and the top estate tax rate from 20 to 45 percent.349 The new law had the effect of doubling the effective tax rate on the richest one percent of households, from 3.4 percent to 6.8 percent.350 It also raised tax avoidance stakes for middle-income and upper-middle income taxpayers, transforming what had been a class-based income tax into a mass-based regime.351 In particular, it lowered personal exemptions for single as well as married taxpayers,352 and raised tax rates throughout the middle-income range.353 But that was just the beginning. Congress upped taxes again in 1934 and 1935, and almost every year between 1940 and 1944. By war’s end, the top marginal rate reached a staggering 94 percent while personal exemptions plummeted to $500 for singles and $1,000 for married couples.354

---

350 Brownlee, supra note 24, at 51.
352 Revenue Act of 1932, supra note 349, at 184.
353 Id. at 174.
354 See Revenue Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 680 (1934) (raising rates in most brackets while holding the top rate at 63 percent); Revenue Act of 1935, 49 Stat. 1014 (1935) (raising taxes on all incomes above $50,000 and upping the top rate to 79 percent); Revenue Act of 1940, 54 Stat. 516 (1940) (adjusting brackets for upper-middle incomes and lowering personal exemptions); Revenue Act of 1941, 55 Stat. 687 (1941) (raising rates with top rate reaching 81 percent and lowering personal exemptions); Revenue Act of 1942, 56 Stat. 583 (1942) (raising rates with top rate reaching 88 percent and lowering personal exemptions); Individual Income Tax Act of 1944, 58 Stat. 231 (1944) (raising rates with top rate reaching 94 percent and lowering personal exemption for married couples). During the war, the government transformed the federal income tax into a mass-based tax. Between 1939 and 1943, the number of income taxpayers jumped from 4 million to 43 million. The broad base and progressive rates (ranging from 22 to
As the value of tax avoidance went up, so did tax litigation. By 1940, federal tax matters constituted “the largest group of cases by subject matter on the [Supreme] Court’s docket.”

In the 1940 term, the Court heard an astonishing 34 cases and an equally high number (24) by historical standards one year earlier. Taxation, law professor Roswell Magill observed, was “by all odds the chief matter of concern of the Court,” as it was with other courts.

To counteract the avoidance efforts that produced litigation, the Supreme Court articulated an expansive definition of income and of ownership under the federal taxing power. Observers were keenly aware of the trend. “The present Court,” Stanley Surrey wrote in 1941, “has already indicated that the steady broadening of the concept of income which characterized the past decade will continue, but at a pace so accelerated that it almost dwarfs the progress of that decade.” Others noted the Court’s increased willingness to explore the outer reaches of Congress’ taxing power rather than the four corners of statutes as written. In more and more cases, the “broad sweep” of what constituted gross income “was construed to indicate Congressional purpose to use the full measure of the taxing power.” Quite consciously, the Court “resorted to sweeping theoretical observations to prevent the obvious escape from the

---

Id. at 781. The Court sided with the government in 27 of the 34 cases. Id. at 780.

Magill, supra note 357, at 1.

Surrey, supra note 355, at 781.

Edmund W. Pavenstedt, The Broadened Scope of Section 22(a): The Evolution of the Clifford Doctrine, 51 YALE L. J. 213, 213-14 (1941). Legal scholars noted the Court’s constitutional rather than statutory approach. See Magill, supra note 357, at 2 (asking whether “the Court attempted to do in some cases what Congress failed to do—seek to obviate avoidance by holding the income taxable to the settlor by a judicially enacted exception to the general rule”); George E. Ray, The Income Tax on Short Term and Revocable Trusts, 53 HARV. L. REV. 1322, 1341 (1940) (noting “while there has been no real slackening in the pace of the taxpayer [to avoid taxes], Congress has been inactive,” and “the courts have taken over more and more the burden of protecting the revenue”).
surtax.”

While it is true that economic gain is not always taxable as income,” the Court wrote in Helvering v. Bruun, “it is settled that the realization of gain need not be in cash derived from the sale of an asset.” “Economic gain” occurred whenever an asset appreciated in value, and the constitution provided few restrictions on when the government could tax that appreciation. Determining when it was appropriate to levy a tax had to be framed “in practical terms and must be shaped by considerations of administrative convenience and taxpayer convenience. A constitutional strait-jacket imposed by the Court would not be conducive to such an answer.”

In the face of aggressive tax avoidance behavior, “[l]egislative ingenuity need not be the sole response to taxpayer ingenuity.”

Judicial resourcefulness was also necessary to protect the revenue, particularly with respect to family taxation. When analyzing the Court’s family tax jurisprudence, one had to “sharply differentiate the statutory and constitutional aspects. What the statute provides is one thing; what the statute may or can provide, under the Constitution, is another thing.”

Ownership remained the lodestar of the analysis, and the Court continued to rely on incidents of ownership beyond strict legal title to frame a broad definition of taxability. “Technical considerations,” the Court warned in its most famous trust case, Helvering v. Clifford, “niceties of the law of trusts or conveyances, or the legal paraphernalia which inventive genius may construct as a refuge from surtaxes should not obscure the basic issue,” which in the case at hand

---

362 Surrey, supra note 194, at 791.
363 Helvering v. Bruun, 309 U.S. 461 (1940) (holding lessor taxable on the value of a building erected by lessee in the year of lessee’s default rather than upon lessor’s disposition of the property).
364 Surrey, supra note 194, at 792.
365 Id. at 810.
366 Paul and Havens, supra note 238, at 241. Defining taxable income, the Court acknowledged, involved “the boundaries of legislative power. It must be dealt with in a large way, as questions of due process always are, not narrowly or pedantically, in slavery to forms or phrases.” Burnet v. Wells, 289 U.S. 670, 677-78 (1930).
involved “the normal consequences of family solidarity.” 367 In Clifford and other family tax cases, observers noted that the Court was “firmly insisting that the realities of the situation must not be forgotten in the confusion of technical arguments. In each case the reality” of the taxpayer’s position reflected an attempt to avoid tax “by a transaction having no substance in itself and deriving its meaning only from the effort at tax reduction.” 368

Adhering to the letter of the law did not guarantee validation by the Court. 369 The family unit provided far too many avenues of escape for the Court to accept a taxpayer’s transaction at face value. In Clifford, the applicable statute said that income from a trust was taxable to beneficiaries if distributable and to the trust if not distributable, but never to the grantor. 370 The Court largely ignored this directive, and examined the transaction under Congress’ taxing power. The question was not whether the taxpayer fit into the form of the trust statutes, but “whether the grantor after the trust had been established may still be treated, under this statutory scheme, as the owner of the corpus.” 371 The answer to the question required “special scrutiny of the arrangement” particularly “where the grantor is the trustee and the beneficiaries are members of his family group…lest what is in reality but one economic unit be multiplied into two or more.” 372 Under its sweeping analysis, the Court found “at best a temporary reallocation of income within an intimate family group. Since the income remains in the family and since the husband retains control over the investment, he has rather complete assurance that the trust will 367 Helvering v. Clifford, 309 U.S. 331, 334, 337 (1940). One year later, the Court noted that it had long prevented “form to obscure the reality” of transactions. Harrison v. Schaffner, 312 U.S. 579, 583 (1941).

368 Surrey, supra note 194 at 803. See also Magill, supra note 357, at 19 (“The taxpayer cannot count on a close technical interpretation; if his case is within the general spirit of the taxing sections, as the Court views it, he will be held liable.”).
369 This was also true in areas extending beyond family taxation. See e.g., Higgins v. Smith, 308 U.S. 473 (1940) (disallowing losses from sales of securities to taxpayer’s wholly-owned corporation); Gregory v. Helvering, 293 U.S. 465 (1935) (requiring a reorganization to have a business purpose to qualify for tax-free treatment).
370 309 U.S. 331 (holding grantor husband rather than beneficiary wife taxable on income from short-term trust).
371 Id. at 334.
372 Id. at 335. Section § 22(a) corresponded to modern 26 U.S.C. § 61.
not affect any substantial change in his economic position.\textsuperscript{373} In similar fashion, the Court looked beyond the statute and probed the outer reaches of the Sixteenth Amendment in holding the grantor taxable in cases involving trusts established for the payment of alimony,\textsuperscript{374} the support of minor children,\textsuperscript{375} and the satisfaction of debts.\textsuperscript{376} Control over income, enjoyment in the power of its disposition, and satisfaction in delivering it to intended recipients also guided the Court in taxing donors on gifts of interest-bearing coupons\textsuperscript{377} and assignor-beneficiaries on assignments of trust income.\textsuperscript{378}

Under its expansive definition of ownership, the Court could choose whomever to give the “shaft.”\textsuperscript{379} The assignee of future salary payments was taxable due to an increase in wealth as the new owner, while the assignor was taxable as the old owner enjoying the power of disposition. Similarly, in the context of divided property interests, the grantor/assignor/donor could be taxed if he actually received the income as well as if he enjoyed disposing of it in satisfaction of some other obligation, while the beneficiary/assignee/donee could be taxed as the new owner of income-bearing property. Faced with taxpayers’ insatiable appetite for tax avoidance, the Court relied on a mix of statutory, constitutional, and philosophical arguments to protect the revenue.

\textsuperscript{373} Id. Commentators noted the importance of “control” in determining ownership of income and, in turn, of taxability. \textit{See e.g.}, Pavenstedt, \textit{supra} note 361, at 230 (“quantum of control” as “the all-important—and perhaps, it may be ventured, the solely decisive—factor when considering” taxability).

\textsuperscript{374} \textit{See e.g.}, Douglas v. Willcuts, 296 U.S. 1, 9 (1935) (finding “no warrant for a construction [of the statutes] which would preclude the laying of the tax against the one who through the discharge of his obligation enjoys the benefit of the income as though he had personally received it.”). \textit{But see} Helvering v. Fuller, 310 U.S. 69 (1940) (holding grantor husband not taxable on income from alimony trust where the trust discharged his duty of support). \textit{Compare} Helvering v. Leonard, 210 U.S. 80 (1914) (holding grantor husband taxable on income from alimony trust where the state granting the divorce retained the power to modify the divorce decree).

\textsuperscript{375} \textit{See e.g.}, Helvering v. Schweitzer, 296 U.S. 551 (1935); Helvering v. Stokes, 296 U.S. 551 (1935).

\textsuperscript{376} \textit{See e.g.}, Helvering v. Blumenthal, 296 U.S. 551 (1935).

\textsuperscript{377} \textit{See Helvering v. Horst}, 311 U.S. 112, 117-18 (1941) (finding that the “power to dispose of income is the equivalent of ownership of it”). \textit{See also} Helvering v. Eubank, 311 U.S. 122, 124 (1941) (holding assignor husband taxable on assignment to wife of renewal insurance commissions payable in the future).

\textsuperscript{378} \textit{See Harrison v. Schaffner}, 312 U.S. 579, 581-82 (1941) (holding assignor mother taxable on income assigned to children from a trust of which she was the beneficiary).

\textsuperscript{379} Robbins, 269 U.S. at 328.
A. Politics of Tax Avoidance and Taxing the Family

Meanwhile, the Treasury Department was busy prosecuting its own anti-avoidance war. It received inspiration from President Franklin Roosevelt, who railed against tax “loopholes” that provided an “unfair advantage to the few.” Tax avoidance was as bad as tax evasion. “‘Tax avoidance’ means you hire a $250,000-fee lawyer,” Roosevelt said, “and he changes the word ‘evasion’ into the word ‘avoidance.’” Both were “inequitable and undemocratic,” and both had been getting worse. In 1937, after persuading the tax-writing committees in Congress to create a Joint Committee on Tax Evasion and Avoidance, Roosevelt argued that avoidance and evasion had become “so widespread and so amazing both in their boldness and their ingenuity that further action without delay seems imperative.” Invoking the words of recently deceased Justice Holmes, Roosevelt wrote to Congress: “‘Taxes are what we pay for civilized society.’ Too many individuals,” however, “want the civilization at a discount.”

Roosevelt’s Treasury Department identified eleven “principal devices” used by taxpayers “with large incomes for the purpose of defeating the income taxes.” Chief among them were three techniques to shift income within the family: trusts, partnerships, and community property law, the last of which Treasury Secretary Henry Morgenthau called “unjustifiable.” All told, $193 million ($2.9 billion in 2009 dollars) in tax revenue was lost annually to separate returns: $159 million ($2.36 billion) from income shifting among common law spouses and another $34

---

381 Roosevelt, The Two Hundred and Twenty-Fifth Press Conference (July 21, 1935), in id. at 313.
382 Id.
383 Tax Evasion and Avoidance: Report of the Joint Committee on Tax Evasion and Avoidance 1 (1937) (Message from President Roosevelt to Congress).
384 Id.
385 Id. at 3-4 (statement of Henry Morgenthau).
million ($500 million) from community property couples.\textsuperscript{387} As a solution to the revenue loss, the Treasury recommended that Congress enact compulsory joint returns, requiring spouses wherever resident to aggregate family income on a single return with tax liability apportioned according to spouses’ respective earned income shares.\textsuperscript{388} Congress took no action on the recommendation,\textsuperscript{389} but Treasury pushed ahead in crafting solutions to family tax avoidance.

Beginning in the mid-1930s, the Treasury Department devoted considerable time to studying family taxation. In the process, it adopted a holistic approach, seeking a solution involving all separate returns and not just those filed by community property spouses.\textsuperscript{390} It quantified the number of separate returns,\textsuperscript{391} the lost revenue associated with separate filing,\textsuperscript{392} and which families it benefited from the practice.\textsuperscript{393} Treasury also evaluated “the complexity of the marital relationship”\textsuperscript{394} and fundamental questions such as “how marital status should affect \textsuperscript{387} Tax Evasion and Avoidance: Hearings before the Joint Committee on Tax Evasion and Avoidance, 75\textsuperscript{th} Cong. 310 (1937) (statement of Roswell Magill, Undersecretary of the Treasury).

\textsuperscript{388} Id. See also id. at 17-21, 33-34. The plan was similar to the one that Treasury had recommended in 1933 and 1934. See H.R. REP. NO. 73-704 pt. 1 at 3, 43-44, 113 (1934), The pro-rata allocation between husband and wife was designed to overcome due process concerns raised in Hoeper (see supra notes 306-14) pertaining to taxing one spouse on the income of another.

\textsuperscript{389} See H.R. Rep. No. 75-1546 (1937).

\textsuperscript{390} See e.g., Carl Shoup, Suggestions for Study of Taxation of Community Property (Sept. 19, 1939), at 1-2, OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/39.5 (urging a coherent approach that viewed the “community property problem” alongside “the general treatment of married versus single taxpayers”).

\textsuperscript{391} See e.g., Ms. Coyle, supra note 27, at Table 1 (finding number of separate returns jumped nearly 60 percent between 1935 and 1939); Martin Atlas, Separate and Joint Returns of Husbands and Wives: Comparison of tax under present law and Treasury proposal (Apr. 16, 1941), OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/41.3; Ms. Coyle and Staff, Present distribution of separate returns of husbands and wives classified by size of their combined net incomes, 1936 (June 7, 1941), OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/41.12.

\textsuperscript{392} See e.g., Revenue Act of 1942: Hearing on H.R. 7378 before the S. Comm. on Fin., 77\textsuperscript{th} Cong. 8 (1942) (statement of Henry Morgenthau) (separate returns costing $400 million annually); Mr. Haas to Mr. Blough (Nov. 13, 1941), cited in Coyle, supra note 27 (separate returns costing $353 million annually).

\textsuperscript{393} See e.g., TREASURY DEPARTMENT, THE TAX TREATMENT OF FAMILY INCOME (1947) in Revenue Revisions, 1947-48: Hearings Before the H. Comm. Ways and Means, 80\textsuperscript{th} Cong. 859 (1947); Mr. Fefferman, Comments on Mr. Turner’s Memorandum Regarding a Plan to Allow Husbands and Wives in all States the Option of Equal Division of Income for Tax Purposes (Dec. 6, 1946), at 5, OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/46.7; Mr. Turner to Dr. Atkeson, Analysis of Effects on Tax Revenue and Individual Burdens on Equalizing Tax Treatment of Community and Noncommunity Income (July 13, 1946), at 2-6, OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/46.7; Anita Wells, Difference in Federal income tax on incomes of specified size in community property and non-community property States, 1935-1944 (Aug. 14, 1943), OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/43.4.

\textsuperscript{394} Roy Blough to Mr. Hanes, Comment on Mr. Wood’s “Alternative Plan for Eliminating Inequalities in Income Tax on Married Couples” (Sept. 27, 1938), at 5, OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/37.3.
tax liability,” how to treat economies of scale in households of varying size, and how to account for imputed income of stay-at-home spouses as well as additional expenses of two-earner families. It also attempted to measure income sharing and power relationships within families, and it monitored changes in community property laws across the country, particularly once common law states began converting to community property solely for tax saving. Treasury’s comprehensive approach accounted for economic, legal, and philosophical considerations. As important, it was aided by a stable of talent that included Roy Blough, Milton Friedman, Roswell Magill, Herman Oliphant, Randolph Paul, Carl Shoup, Stanley Surrey, William Vickrey, and Jacob Viner.

397 See e.g., id; Roy Blough to Mr. Sullivan, Compulsory Joint Returns (June 10, 1941), at 1, OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/41.9.

398 See e.g., Revenue Act of 1942, supra note ???, at 392 (statement of Randolph Paul) (proposing a working wife tax credit); Richard Slitor, Special income tax allowance for earnings of wife or head of family (Nov. 10, 1943), OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/43.10 (same).

399 TREASURY DEPARTMENT, supra note ???, at 859 (noting that existing empirical data indicated spouses consumed family income “for the joint benefit of both spouses”); Mr. Fefferman, Issues Involved in the Income-Splitting Plan (Feb. 18, 1947), at 1, OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/46.7 (examining sharing and consumption patterns within families); Blough to Hanes, supra note ???, (concluding it was impossible to learn the “actual truth” of these relationships).

400 See e.g., Anita Wells, Community Property (July 24, 1941), at 12, OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/41.23; Ellis W. Manning, Oklahoma Community Property Law of 1939 (1940), at 4, OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/41.23; Anita Wells to Roy Blough (Nov. 6, 1939), Box 54, Folder GA-5/39.6 (discussing Oklahoma optional community property law).

401 Economist, University of Chicago, Columbia University; Member, Council of Economic Advisors; Assistant Secretary and Director, Division of Tax Research, Treasury.

402 Economist, University of Chicago; Nobel Laureate.

403 Law professor, Columbia University; Chief Attorney, Assistant Secretary, and Undersecretary, Treasury.

404 Law professor, University of Chicago, Columbia University; General Counsel, Treasury.

405 General Counsel, Treasury; Director, New York Federal Reserve Bank; Founder, Paul Weiss LLP.

406 Economist and lawyer, University of Chicago; Led multiple tax missions on behalf of the U.S. government after World War II; Credited with inventing the concept of value-added taxation.

407 Law professor, Harvard University; Assistant Secretary and Tax Legislative Counsel, Treasury; Pioneered the concept of a tax expenditure budget.

408 Economist, Columbia University; Nobel Laureate.

409 Economist; University of Chicago; Special Advisor, Treasury; Early proponent of monetarism.
By the mid-1940s, opinion among Treasury’s experts was unanimous: use of the individual as the tax unit produced multiple inequities when applied to the family.\textsuperscript{410} Taxing the family as an entity could equalize taxes among similarly situated families, prevent income shifting among family members, and raise federal revenues. It also enjoyed “the basic merit of recognizing the family as a single unit in its financial affairs, consistently with its unity in other respects and with governmental policy in other fields,”\textsuperscript{411} including “relief, subsidized housing and minimum wage determination.”\textsuperscript{412} For “the bulk” of Americans, “the family is a communal organization which serves as the unit for income receipt, for spending, [] for measuring sacrifice,” and for determining ability to pay taxes.\textsuperscript{413}

Treasury’s thinking coincided with a growing consensus among experts, courts, and Congress. Current law allowed families to create “an unreal number of economic units”\textsuperscript{414} that achieved “multiplication of the taxpayer’s personality.”\textsuperscript{415} Families acted in “every other vital economic and social respect…on a consolidated basis,” but not under the tax law.\textsuperscript{416} Income shifting devices and community property, Randolph Paul said, obscured the unity of the family to make it appear “as if there were no such economic unit.”\textsuperscript{417} Family tax avoidance not only reduced revenues, but backlogged courts. “Our tax machinery is too heavily strained to stand this increasing load of litigation,” Stanley Surrey warned.\textsuperscript{418} The law should be changed “to require \textsuperscript{410} See e.g., TREASURY DEPARTMENT, supra note ???, at 849, 851-52 (stating that individual tax unit produced “substantial tax differences between families with equal incomes”).

\textsuperscript{411} Haas to Blough, supra note ???. See also WILLIAM VICKREY, AGENDA FOR PROGRESSIVE TAXATION 74-75 (1947) (arguing families made consumption expenditures “for the joint benefit of all members of the family”).

\textsuperscript{412} Blough to Sullivan, supra note ???, at 1.

\textsuperscript{413} Id.

\textsuperscript{414} Pavenstedt, supra note ???, at 216.

\textsuperscript{415} Paul, supra note ???, at 48.

\textsuperscript{416} Paul and Havens, supra note ???, at 264.

\textsuperscript{417} Paul, supra note ???, at 48-49.

\textsuperscript{418} Surrey, supra note ???, at 982.
husbands and wives and minor children living together to file a composite return.”

Treating families as a unit could “eliminate the greater part of questionable current avoidance, and would remove the unjustified tax differential between citizens of community property states and those of other states.”

The Supreme Court had already begun recognizing the family as a taxable unit. In Wells, the Court emphasized the “solidarity of the family,” while in Clifford it found a “temporary reallocation of income within an intimate family group.” In Hormel v. Helvering, the Court handed down a “startling broadening of the family solidarity concept” by effectively finding that trustee-wives could never act independently of co-trustee-husbands. The Court also validated the unity of the family with respect to loss deductions from sales of property between family members, aggregated charitable deductions, and different exemption levels for single and married taxpayers. These and other decisions prompted observers to predict that the Court would uphold a tax statute treating the family as a unit.

Congress appeared willing to consider such a statute. It noted the Court’s receptivity to taxing the family as a unit and it debated alternatives to tax families on total rather than

420 Id.
422 Helvering v. Clifford, 309 U.S. 331, 335 (1940).
424 Pavenstedt, supra note ???, at 220 (writing that the Court considered “one spouse the alter ego of the other”).
428 See e.g., George E. Ray, Proposed Changes in Federal Taxation of Community Property: Income Tax, 30 CAL. L. REV. 397, 432 (1942) (expressing “little doubt as to the constitutionality of a statutory provision taxing the income of a family as a unit”); Surrey, supra note ???, at 814 (concluding “the Court will not place a constitutional barrier” to taxing the family as a unit); Roswell Magill, The Federal Income Tax on the Family, 20 TEX. L. REV. 150, 164 (1941-42) (calling the constitutionality of taxing the family as a unit “reasonably clear”).
429 See H.R. Rep. No. 77-1040 (1941), at 10, 17-22 (noting Court decisions “conclusively demonstrate that the convenient phrase, ‘A may not be taxed on B’s’ income, is by no means an all-pervasive formula which will assist in the solution of tax problems”).
individual income. A number of tax statutes already treated the family as an economic unit, including the option to file joint returns, personal exemptions for married taxpayers, the disallowance of loss deductions from sales of property between family members, and the treatment of family members as one person for purposes of personal holding companies. But what would a generalized statute look like that treated all families as single economic units? Management and control plans discriminated against community property spouses by failing to address income-shifting arrangements among common law spouses, and Congress had already rejected the plan three times. Mandatory joint returns had fared as poorly. And although concerns over the plan’s constitutionality had ebbed, the prevailing wisdom was that “you cannot get the votes to make a law out of it.”

Enter the split-income plan. As early as 1937, the Treasury Department considered remedying longstanding family tax problems by moving “in the direction of the community property states, not away from them.” The idea of universalizing community property for tax purposes floated around Congress in the early 1940s, and tax experts regularly discussed the concept. Extending community property nationwide even made its way into the public 430 See Revenue Revision of 1942: Hearing before H. Comm. on Ways and Means, 77th Cong. (1942) (mandatory joint return with pro-rata liability); Revenue Act of 1942, supra note 392 (same); H.R. Rep. No. 77-1040 (1941) (same); S. Rep. No. 77-673 (1941) (hybrid joint return plan with earned income taxable to the earner and unearned income taxable to the spouse with management and control).

---

431 See supra note 428.
433 Blough and Shoup, supra note 396.
434 Revenue Revision of 1942, supra note 430, at 32-33 (statement of Robert Taft) (“It seems to me, if you want to eliminate [tax disparities between families] the thing to do is to go back to the individual basis and let the families divide their income between husband and wife equally, as they do in community property states”). See also id., at 2731 (statement of Ellsworth C. Alvord, U.S. Chamber of Commerce) (urging Congress to “bring[] the other States up to the level of community property States”).
435 See George T. Altman, Community Property: Avoiding Avoidance by Adoption in the Revenue Act, 16 TAX MAG. 138, 141 (1938) (arguing for taxing similarly situated families equally by “extending to all the benefits now limited to the few”); Erwin N. Griswold, Cases and Materials on Federal Taxation 427 (1940) (querying whether it was “feasible to extend to all of the country the tax benefits of the community system”).
discourse.\footnote{See McMahon, \textit{supra} note 17; Jones, \textit{supra} note 351, at 266-74.} Common law states sought tax saving for their married residents without adopting community property laws. In 1947, ten states\footnote{Colorado, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.} petitioned Congress for a law universalizing community property for purposes of filing federal income taxes, and individual legislators introduced twenty bills providing income-splitting privileges to spouses nationwide.\footnote{See Anita Wells, \textit{Community property States} (Sept. 1, 1947), OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/47.15.} Public opinion polls reflected the widespread support, with 74 percent of respondents answering “yes” to the Gallup poll question: “For the purpose of income taxes in nine States a man and wife can divide their income equally between themselves to reduce their income tax. Should married couples in the other 39 States be allowed to do the same thing?”\footnote{\textit{Individual Income Tax Reduction: Hearing on H.R. 1 before S. Comm. on Fin.}, 80th Cong. 551 (1947) (statement William Fulbright).}

By 1948, five states and one territory decided they could wait no longer for Congress to intervene.\footnote{Hawaii (1945), Michigan (1947), Nebraska (1947), Oklahoma (1939), Oregon (1943), and Pennsylvania (1947). See McMahon, \textit{supra} note 17 (discussing states’ efforts to reduce federal taxes on their residents).} They took the drastic step of converting from longstanding common law regimes to community property law, while twelve more states considered similar measures.\footnote{Alabama, Colorado, Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. Some common law residents sought tax savings by migrating to neighboring community property states. For the tax-induced exodus from common law to community property states, see \textit{Cong. Rec.} (May 27, 1947), at 5837-40 (statements of John McClellan, William Knowland, Kenneth Wherry, William Fulbright).} The Treasury urged Congress to enact a national plan before additional states made the awkward conversion to community property, a process that created “considerable confusion and dislocation of property interests in the various States.”\footnote{\textit{Individual Income Tax Reduction: Hearing on H.R. 1, supra} note ???, at 490 (statement of Stanley Surrey).} With “so many States shifting” and with others prepared to do the same, Treasury official Stanley Surrey argued that it was “proper for the Federal Government to act” with a split income plan.\footnote{\textit{Id. See also Erwin G. Griswold, Defense Emphasizes Our Need for Sound Tax System}, N.Y. TIMES (Jan. 12, 1941), at E8 (arguing that forcing common law states to adopt community property was “highly undesirable in view of complexity of that regime”).}
Other historical factors converged to move the idea of income splitting to the top of the policy agenda. In the immediate postwar period Congress sought tax cuts, both as a peace dividend and as a way to stimulate the economy. Experts, too, believed that tax cuts could ease the economy’s transition from wartime to peacetime, and provide the necessary stimulus to private investment.\(^{444}\) Income splitting accomplished the desired tax reduction without protracted and acrimonious debate over adjustments to tax rates and brackets.

After sweeping to victory in the 1946 mid-term elections, Republicans wasted little time in passing two tax reduction bills. President Truman vetoed them both on grounds they offered “the wrong kind of tax reduction at the wrong time.”\(^{445}\) The Republican leadership repackaged tax cuts a third time in a “veto-proof” bill that provided something for everyone.\(^{446}\) It increased personal and dependent exemptions,\(^ {447}\) a move that appealed to Democrats, and it lowered tax rates across the board,\(^ {448}\) a move supported by Republicans. The bill also permitted spouses nationwide to split marital income and property for purposes of filing federal income taxes,\(^ {449}\) a provision that amounted to an additional tax cut for married, common law taxpayers. It even included something for community property residents: repeal of the 1942 amendments to the federal estate and gift taxes that had raised transfer taxes on community property spouses.\(^ {450}\)

Truman opposed the bill, but there was little he could do to prevent its enactment. The split-income plan accomplished “simplicity of taxpayer compliance, ease of administration, and \(^{444}\) See e.g., Randolph Paul, Taxation for Prosperity (1947); Harold M. Groves, Postwar Taxation and Economic Progress (1946); Clark Warburton, A Suggestion for Post-War Taxes, 36 Am. Econ. Rev. 882 (1946); Carl Shoup, Three Plans for Post-War Taxation, 34 Am. Econ. Rev. 757 (1944).

\(^{447}\) H.R. 4970, § 201, 80th Cong. (2nd Sess. 1948).

\(^{448}\) Id. at §§ 101 and 401.

\(^{449}\) Id. at § 301.

\(^{450}\) Id. at § 351. See also S. Rep. No. 80-1013 (Supplementary Report) (1948). The 1942 amendments ignored the separate ownership interests of spouses under community property law, and taxed the predeceasing spouse as full owner of the marital property in addition to the surviving spouse on her share at death. With respect to the gift tax, the law treated community property spouses as a single entity such that they received one gift tax exemption while common law spouses received two.
minimum of disruptive change in the local laws of States.” It prescribed the soothing pill of “tax reduction and tax equalization.” It did not “do violence to the fundamental property laws” of states, nor raise constitutional concerns. It produced tax uniformity among married couples, discouraged income-shifting schemes, and minimized litigation over tax-saving devices. It stanched the “impetuous enactment” of community property law, moreover. And it promised tax saving for all married couples, a group that comprised 80 percent of all households. Common law spouses benefited from dividing marital income equally, while community property spouses benefited from dividing income from separate property, a source of income which was not co-owned under community property law.

In the end, the income splitting plan, along with the rest of the Revenue Act of 1948, sailed through Congress, easily overcoming Truman’s third veto of tax legislation in less than a year. Tax reformers heralded income splitting as a victory. Basking in its enactment, Harvard law professor and former Treasury official Stanley Surrey observed with satisfaction that the provision would “add a chapter” to “the long history of the treatment of family income” that was “likely the last for many years.” Moreover, it reflected the principle “that achievement of tax equity among married couples requires an income tax based upon a nationwide uniform plan that 451 Division of Tax Research Staff, Major Issues in Drafting the 50-50 Family Income Splitting Proposal (Oct. 2, 1947), at 2, OTA/DTR Files, Box 54, Folder GA-5/47.10.

455 In 1948, the tax benefits associated with income splitting accrued disproportionately to a small cohort of wealthy taxpayers. See Reduction of Individual Income Taxes, supra note 453, at 30 (statement of John Snyder) (reporting that 97.5 percent of income-splitting benefits went to less than four percent of taxpayers). Rising incomes and the declining value of tax-free thresholds in the postwar period, however, meant that an increasing number of spouses would realize income-splitting benefits over the next several decades.
disregards, as between husband and wife, the legal allocation of their income or the legal ownership of the property producing the income."\textsuperscript{460}

With the enactment of income splitting, ownership as the lodestar of family taxation had been supplanted by a legal fiction. Or had it?

CONCLUSION

In 1935, tax lawyers Randolph Paul and Valentine Havens argued that treating husbands and wives as single tax units could solve the problems associated with ascertaining family tax liability under an ownership rule. "There would be no need to resort to ownership as a test of tax incidence if the husband and wife were a tax unit or ‘unified welded entity.’"\textsuperscript{461} Paul and Havens were right that treating spouses under the federal income tax as a single unit rather than two distinct units with "legal separateness"\textsuperscript{462} would shift the focus from the individual to the family.
But it would not eliminate ownership "as a test of tax incidence." At best, it replaced an ownership rule concerned with individual interests with another ownership rule concerned with combined interests. Aggregating a family’s income and property to determine its tax liability still required examining ownership interests of individual family members under state property law.

The income splitting provision enacted in 1948 was even less of a threat to the ownership principle than the concept of treating families as single economic units. It was “simply a method of calculating the Federal income tax on a husband and wife who file a joint return,” Stanley Surrey told Congress in 1947.\textsuperscript{463} It was an administrative convenience, a device to extend postwar tax cuts and to discourage families from undertaking costly income-shifting behavior.
As the Senate explained in its own description of the provision, it merely allowed husbands and \textsuperscript{460} Id. at 1113.

\textsuperscript{461} Paul and Havens, supra note 238, at 245.
\textsuperscript{462} Id.
\textsuperscript{463} Statement of Stanley Surrey, supra note 442, at 490.
wives the “opportunity” to “file joint returns, divide their net income and exemptions by two, compute their tax on this basis, and multiply the result by two.”

Income splitting did not challenge Seaborn’s holding that the federal income tax was a levy “upon the net income of every individual” and that “the word ‘of’ denotes ownership.” Nor did it alter prevailing internal revenue laws requiring that the federal income tax be “levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every individual.” And it certainly did not stop federal and state courts from invoking Seaborn over 100 times for the “ownership equals taxability” principle. Owners of income and property within families were still subject to federal income taxation, and ownership was still determined by the interests of individual family members under applicable state law.

Eighty years after Seaborn and sixty years after introduction of the income splitting provision, the “ownership equals taxability” principle still resonates. Indeed, not only is Seaborn good law, it remains the lodestar of family taxation. Notwithstanding the history and jurisprudence supporting this conclusion, the Internal Revenue Service has restricted Seaborn’s holding to certain kinds of families: heterosexual husbands and wives. The ruling interprets the legal status of registered domestic partners (RDPs) under California community property law. The IRS position that Seaborn does not apply to RDPs involves three arguments: (i) unlike California married couples, RDPs are prohibited by statute from treating combined earned 466 26 U.S.C. (old) § 22. Current law reflects the same focus on individual ownership, even for married taxpayers. See 26 U.S.C. §§ 1(a)-(d) (the federal income tax reaches the “taxable income” of “every married individual…who makes a single return jointly with his spouse”; of “every head of a household”; of “every individual…who is not a married individual”; and of “every married individual” who does not file jointly).

---

467 Cases on file with author.
468 See also McMahon, supra note 17.
469 See supra note 3 for recent cases citing Seaborn favorably.
470 Supra note 7. Subsequent to the ruling, the IRS included the same prohibition in its guidance for all taxpayers living in community property states. See IRS Publication 555, Community Property (5-2007).
income as owned equally for purposes of filing state income taxes, a feature of the law purportedly expressing California’s desire to exclude RDPs from Seaborn’s equal ownership rule; (ii) California’s community property regime is elective for RDPs but not for married couples, which, under the authority of Commissioner v. Harmon, would invalidate RDPs’ claim for equal ownership under state property law; and (iii) Seaborn’s “ownership equals taxability” holding “has always arisen solely in the context of spouses.”

These arguments are irrelevant and ultimately unavailing.

First, subsequent to the IRS ruling, the California legislature repealed the provision prohibiting RDPs from filing state income taxes in the same manner as California spouses. “It is the intent of the Legislature,” the final bill clarified, “that the inconsistency between registered domestic partners and spouses with respect to state income taxation be removed, registered domestic partners be permitted to file their income tax returns jointly or separately on terms similar to those governing spouses, and the earned income of registered domestic partners be recognized appropriately as community property.” In other words, California RDPs pay state taxes just like spouses.

Second, the ruling’s invocation of Harmon is inapposite. Harmon involved Oklahoma’s short-lived optional community property law. According to the leading scholar on the subject, “the allure of the community property regime [in Oklahoma] had been intimately linked to its tax savings,” a fact not overlooked by the Court as it sought to determine whether the Oklahoma statute sufficiently altered incidents of ownership or inappropriately authorized tax savings for

---

472 Id. at 3.
474 Id. at 2.
475 McMahon, supra note 17, at 622. For a wonderful discussion of Oklahoma’s optional community property law and the Harmon decision, see id. at 592-611.
state residents. In the end, the Court analogized the Oklahoma statute to prohibited assignments of income, which, “even though authorized by state law and irrevocable in character,” did not transfer necessary ownership interests for purposes of the federal income tax.\footnote{Harmon, 323 U.S. at 47.} The optional Oklahoma statute looked and operated more like a private law contract than a general law property regime, the latter of which vested by operation of law rather than by individual discretion. California RDPs are likewise subject to the state’s community property system by operation of law.\footnote{See Cain, supra note 14, at 846 (“Under California law, RDPs are mandatorily subject to the community property regime. For them, community property is part of a single system and not an option they can elect or reject while retaining the rest of the rights and obligations of the system.”).} As such, Seaborn rather than Harmon controls.

Most importantly, and as this Article has established, application of Seaborn follows ownership, not marriage. It involves ascertaining property interests as determined by state law rather than locating the presence or absence of a marriage license. California law considers RDPs— like opposite-sex spouses—co-owners of all community income and property, a fact that invokes the application of Seaborn whether the IRS likes it or not. Even if Seaborn were to apply exclusively to marriage under state law, as the IRS maintains, a California domestic partnership is the legal equivalent of marriage. Indeed, under state property law RDPs “shall have the same rights, protections, and benefits, and shall be subject to the same responsibilities, obligations, and duties under law…as are granted to and imposed upon spouses.”\footnote{Cal. Fam. Code § 297.5(a).}

Seaborn entitles RDPs in California to treat for federal income tax purposes all income acquired by the domestic partnership as owned fifty-fifty by each domestic partner and to file two tax returns each reflecting one-half the domestic partnership’s total income. The same result could obtain for other non-traditional legally formalized relationships in the remaining eight community property states. Currently, only Washington and Nevada have extended significant community property rights to non-traditional families, adopting domestic partnerships similar to California’s, while Wisconsin has passed a law granting limited marital rights and obligations to domestic partners. Other community property states may follow suit. Seaborn’s holding applies to members of legally recognized relationships in non-community property states as well, including those in same-sex marriages, civil unions, reciprocal beneficiary relationships, and domestic partnerships. To the extent these families enjoy shared property interests as defined by state law, Seaborn authorizes them to reflect that interest on federal tax returns.

479 Arizona, Idaho, Louisiana, New Mexico, Nevada, Texas, Washington, and Wisconsin.
480 See SB 5688 - 2009-10, Chapter 521, Laws of 2009 (Wash.); Senate Bill No. 283 (Nev.).
481 See 2009 Wisconsin Act 28.
482 New Mexico, for one, is close to enacting a wide-ranging domestic partnership law. See http://www.365gay.com/news/new-mexico-domestic-partnership-moves-forward/.
483 Connecticut, Iowa, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont.
485 Only Hawaii provides reciprocal beneficiary relationships.
486 District of Columbia, Maine, Maryland, Oregon.