TEACHING AND RESEARCH INTERESTS

I teach Constitutional Law I & II and seminars in Law & Religion and Constitutional Theory. My research interests are in constitutional history and theory, the Establishment Clause, and constitutional education. My long-term project is a book about how the Constitution is taught (and learned) in American high schools.

WORKS IN PROGRESS

James Wilson in the State House Yard: Ratifying the Structures of Popular Sovereignty

This is an exploration and extrapolation of the large themes in Wilson's famous speech in defense of the Constitution. I ground Wilson's ideas about popular sovereignty in his common sense philosophy, and examine the ways that his conception shaped the ratification process.

Constitutional Values and Interpretive Theory Choice

Later in life, Thomas Kuhn argued that scientists adopt new theories based in part on how well they serve particular values, which each practitioner may hold in different combinations. As a result, theory choices are not entirely "objective", in the sense many presume, but instead flow from underlying commitments to particular value structures. I contend that this is also the case when judges or practitioners making interpretive theory choices in constitutional law. I identify a number of constitutional values and explore their correlation to various interpretive theories

Educating the Popular Sovereign: How Our High Schools Shape Our Constitution

Book-length project on how and what high school students learn about the Constitution, and the implications this has for our interpretive culture and the institutions of popular sovereignty.
