Gay Marriage: The Issue

GAY MARRIAGE: THE ISSUE

Mariage matters, no matter that skeptics tell us it won’t. What makes marriage unique is that it confers a particular set of benefits that can only be realized within the marriage relationship. These benefits are both economic and social, providing a sense of security and stability that is not found elsewhere. It is this unique set of benefits that makes marriage so important to individuals and society as a whole.

Michael Warner made the same arguments that I have in his book “What’s Normal?” He argues that marriage is not just a legal contract, but a social institution that provides a sense of belonging and identity. Warner’s arguments are compelling, and they should be taken seriously by those who are interested in the future of marriage.

The arguments against marriage are not persuasive. The claim that marriage is outdated is simply not true. The benefits of marriage are too great to be ignored. And the social benefits of marriage are too important to be overlooked.

In conclusion, I believe that marriage is a necessary institution that provides important benefits to individuals and society as a whole. We should work to ensure that everyone has access to marriage and the benefits that come with it.
