Mystery Lives Even in New Jersey (Prose Poem)

Jan Wellington, Utah Valley University
Mystery Lives Even in New Jersey

The Delaware Bay

I come from a coastal plain whose mountains are molehills. Digging in the backyard, all I hit is water. Long ago bones have dissolved and the meager pebbles aren’t telling, nor are malls or churches resurrected as real estate with startled graves for neighbors. Recency is the theme written by the interstate over burial grounds just real enough to explain freak accidents, miracle recoveries, haloed animals plunging in front of cars in rainstorms and disappearing.

Forgotten places on the bay stutter the older story. Clamshells and pool balls clack in Shellpile; Bivalve’s crackerbox chapels ring dogged revival. The marshes are quieter but still swish with hints of seabird and horseshoe crab orgies. Bobcat, otter, bison, mastodon, * eohippus* pass in front of a car parked on the estuary where rotting hulls knock rotting docks and sad smells grow in the reeds. Roads without name lasso visitors who blunder suspended in the margin, emerging centuries removed from the place they stepped in.

The Pine Barrens

Long-a-Coming, Hampton Furnace, Ong’s Hat, Shamong—names the stagedriver called swallowed by sand, by pines, by time, shuffled from needle to falling needle, buried with cannonballs and lady’s slippers, the civilizing urge’s back turned on the howling boredom, the shattering sameness of mile after mile of nothing but sand, pines, and time.

See that black tophat bobbing on a branch where Ong flung it on being jilted by his faithless bride? See Martha, or Washington—towns that aren’t—gathering matter amongst an illusion of trees? Devils are born in such places of a starving mother’s bargain to sacrifice her thirteenth child in a cabin between the black woods and blinding marshes. One time two or three centuries ago, one such monster slashed the womb and fled its bloody nest up the chimney, trailing its lightning tail and cow’s feet, thrashing its vulture feathers, casting a diabolical laugh to the wind.

For most of us the past is a daytrip, for who would be willing to stay past dinner, past sunset, into the starless night under the moaning pines and chance that devil’s laugh?

Sweetwater

Leave your suburb. Drive dumbfounded miles through the pines to this restaurant washed up on a Mullica backwater. Casino, they call it—the gamble is which tune the organist will play next in his trance.

Try the oyster pie, say the local spirits, old ones who slipped through the trees and never left, couples who talk like pines to river, lap and whisper. No meal compares with this slow feast on the cusp.
Stroll full down the lawn to the floating pier. Watch sunset singe the pines as the last boat chugs home. Move with the river leaving for its millionth tryst with the moon. Something rushing past in the current urges you to taste water sweeter than you’ve known.

Trying to explain about Cape May Diamonds is trying to explain how false advertising is true. What is a gem but a stone’s talents exposed? Seaward, set in curly kelp, or bayward, tumbled underfoot, pearls from a necklace flung to tease our excess of lust in a love become addiction. We genuflect to the most curvaceous specimen among millions.

It’s not a question of market value but the distance passion reels us toward a stone.

* Cape May diamonds are translucent quartz pebbles found on the beach at New Jersey’s southernmost tip.