Completing Caperton and Clarifying Common Sense Through Using The Right Standard for Constitutional Judicial Recusal

Jeffrey W Stempel
COMPLETING CAPERTON AND CLARIFYING COMMON SENSE THROUGH USING THE RIGHT STANDARD FOR CONSTITUTIONAL JUDICIAL RECUSAL

Jeffrey W. Stempel ©

Introduction

I. The Road to Caperton

A. The Underlying Action

B. The 2004 West Virginia Supreme Court Elections

C. Review and Recusal

D. The Supreme Court Intervenes

E. Caperton’s Test for Determining When Recusal is Required by the Due Process Clause

II. Assessing Caperton

A. Comparing the “Reasonable Question as to Impartiality” Standard for Non-Constitutional Recusal Under Federal and State Law with the Constitutional Due Process Standard of a “Probability of Actual Bias”

B. The Dissenters’ Perspective in Caperton

C. The Unpersuasive Criticisms of Caperton

States’ Rights Federalism

Limits on Free Expression

Practical Problems of Implementation

D. The Correctness of the Caperton Holding

III. Making Caperton Better Through Clarity and Expansion Rather than Retrenchment

---

*Doris S. & Theodore B. Lee Professor of Law, William S. Boyd School of Law, University of Nevada Las Vegas. Thanks to Janette Bloom, Bill Boyd, George Kuhlman, Doris Lee, Ted Lee, Bill Maupin, Ann McGinley, Jim Rogers, Tuan Samahon, John White the members of Nevada’s Judicial Code Commission for ideas and continuing support (but not necessarily agreement with the suggestions in this article). Thanks also to Jeanne Price, Shannon Rowe, Jennifer Gross and Chad Schatzle for valuable research assistance. © 2009 Jeffrey W. Stempel
A. The Value of Harmonizing Constitution-Based Disqualification and Recusal Based on Rule or Statute

B. Fear Not the Floodgates

C. Procedural and Substantive Due Process Regarding Disqualification
   1. Primarily a Problem of Procedure
   2. The Practical Problems of a Purely Procedural Approach

D. Continuing Concern Over Substantive Due Process and Disqualification

E. Guidelines for Invoking Substantive Due Process Disqualification
   1. In Campaign Support Cases
   2. Generally

Conclusion

Introduction

In Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., the U.S. Supreme Court vacated a state supreme court decision in which a justice who had received $3 million in campaign support from a litigant cast the deciding vote to relieve the litigant of a $50 million liability. The Court reached this result, one I view as compelled by common sense, through a 5-4 vote, with the dissenters, led by Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Antonin Scalia, minimizing the danger of biased judging presented by the situation and questioning the practical feasibility of the 2 See infra text accompanying notes 13-22 (reviewing facts of Caperton). Technically, the campaign contributor was not a formal party to the litigation. He was, however, the CEO of litigant Massey as well as the personification of the company.

---

3 See Caperton, 129 S. Ct. 2252, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 (Kennedy, J., joined by Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg & Breyer, JJ, forming majority voting to vacate West Virginia Supreme Court decision where state court justice casting deciding vote had received $3 million in campaign aid from CEO of defendant Massey; and Roberts, C.J., joined by Scalia, Thomas & Alito, JJ, voting to let the decision stand in spite of key participation by challenged state court justice); id. at 2274-75, *57-*59 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (shorter dissent criticizing majority for extending due process review to cases of judicial recusal based on campaign activity).
4 See id. at 2273, *54-55, 173 L.Ed.2d at 1226 (Robert, C.J., dissenting) (“And why is the Court so convinced that this is an extreme case? It is true that Don Blankenship spend a large amount of money in connection with this election. But this point cannot be emphasized strongly enough: Other than a $1,000 direct contribution from Blankenship, [disqualified West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals] Justice [Brent] Benjamin and his campaign had no control over how this money was spent.”)(italics in original). See also id. at 2273, *55-56 (“Moreover, Blankenship’s [$3 million in] independent expenditures do not appear ‘grossly disproportionate’ compared to other such expenditures in this very election.”); Id. at 2275, *59 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (“The Court today continues its
Court’s approach as well as the wisdom of expanding review of state court judicial disqualification pursuant to the Due Process Clause.\textsuperscript{5}

Although its critics see \textit{Caperton} as an unwise intrusion into state elections and state disqualification practice,\textsuperscript{6} \textit{Caperton}’s biggest problem is that it did not go far enough and make due process congruent with prevailing state and federal disqualification standards. By crafting a “probability of bias” test for due process-based constitutional disqualification that differs (albeit perhaps not greatly) from the well-established general approach to disqualification of a judge when his or her impartiality may be reasonably questioned, the Court has been unduly tentative and confusing in setting the parameters of judicial impartiality. The Court should recognize that any error in failing to recuse\textsuperscript{7} deprives the affected litigant of a fundamental constitutional right – the right to have the case heard by a neutral adjudicator. Consequently, any erroneous rejection of a request to recuse is at least technically one of constitutional dimension that should be potentially subject to U.S. Supreme Court review and correction.\textsuperscript{8}

However, the Court need not become mired in the flood of disqualification cases predicted by the dissenting justices in \textit{Caperton}. Insistence upon review of disqualification decisions by a neutral body of judges can be used to ensure that litigants receive sufficient procedural due process. The constitutional question surrounding judicial recusal is primarily one of procedural due process. If states put in place adequate procedures for deciding and reviewing disqualification motions, few \textit{Caperton}-like situations compelling high court intervention are \textsuperscript{5} See id. at 2268, *40 (Roberts, C.J., dissenting) (contending that the “end result [of the majority’s decision favoring disqualification] will do far more to erode public confidence in judicial impartiality than an isolated failure to recuse in a particular case” and raising list of specific questions regarding application of majority’s standards for judicial impartiality satisfying constitutional due process); id. at 2274, *57, *59 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (In the best of all possible worlds, should judges sometimes recuse even where the clear commands of our prior due process law do not require it? Undoubtedly. The relevant question, however, is whether we do more good than harm by seeking to correct this imperfection through expansion of our constitutional mandate in a manner ungoverned by any discernable rule. The answer is obvious.).

\textsuperscript{6} More precisely, the Roberts dissent posed 40 questions in defense of its view that the majority’s invocation of the Due Process Clause to require judicial disqualification due to receipt of enormous campaign contributions was not a sustainably practical approach to policing the judicial integrity of state courts. Forty enumerated questions, that is, with many containing subparts or follow-up questions. If one calculates the total number of questions in the Roberts dissent as one would in reviewing litigation interrogatories, the total number of questions actually totals 80 queries. See id. at 2267, 2269-72, *39, *44-52 (Robert, C.J., dissenting).

\textsuperscript{7} This article treats the words “disqualification” and “recusal” as synonyms. Some courts and commentators have historically distinguished the terms, suggesting that disqualification is a judge’s mandatory obligation to avoid participation in a case while recusal is a more voluntary, discretionary act informed by the judges own preferences as well as prevailing law. See RICHARD E. FLAMM, JUDICIAL DISQUALIFICATION: RECUSAL AND DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGES §20.8 at 3-4, passim (2d ed. 2007) (noting traditional distinction but using terms interchangeably through the treatise); JAMES J. ALFINI, STEVEN LUBET, JEFFREY M. SHAMAN & CHARLES GARDNER GEYH, JUDICIAL CONDUCT AND ETHICS,§ 4.04 at 4-11 (2007) (tending to use disqualification as preferred term but using recusal as acceptable synonym); Geoffrey P. Miller, \textit{Bad Judges}, 83 TEX. L. REV. 431, 460 (2004) (outlining traditional distinction between the terms); Debra Lyn Bassett, \textit{Judicial Disqualification in the Federal Appellate Courts}, 87 IOWA L. REV. 1213 (2002) (using terms interchangeably).

\textsuperscript{8} See infra Part II.D (outlining argument at greater length).
likely to ensue.\textsuperscript{9} Where erroneous recusal decisions occur in spite of such safeguards, U.S. Supreme Court review should be at least potentially available as necessary to vindicate the strong constitutional interest in neutral courts and fair adjudication, an interest sounding in substantive due process.\textsuperscript{10} The Court need exercise this potential power only in relatively egregious cases, thereby promoting judicial economy while nonetheless discouraging disqualification abuses.

In making its assessments regarding whether review of non-disqualification is required, the Court should generally consider the five factors set forth in this article\textsuperscript{11} and, in cases involving campaign support as a basis for recusal, the considerations outlined in the amicus brief of the Conference of Chief Justices.\textsuperscript{12} Using these yardsticks, the Court can, as necessary, make infrequent forays into judicial disqualification matters without unduly burdening the court or creating either uncertainty or paranoia among state judges and justices.

Part I of this article reviews the \textit{Caperton} case and the Court’s decision. Part II assesses \textit{Caperton} and criticisms of the decision, including comparison of \textit{Caperton}’s constitutional standard (existence of an objective probability of bias by the judge or justice under review) with the non-constitutional standard for judicial neutrality under federal law and state law patterned after the ABA Code of Judicial Conduct (existence of a reasonable question as to the challenged jurist’s impartiality). Finding that the latter standard better protects litigants and can be employed without undue strain on the judicial system, Part III advocates that \textit{Caperton}’s constitutional due process disqualification standard be harmonized with the prevailing non-constitutional standards. It also examines the issues of procedural and substantive due process and outlines the factors for use in recusal cases growing out of campaign support and those applicable to Supreme Court policing of state court disqualification decisions generally.

Rather than maintaining a separate standard for policing judicial disqualification pursuant to the Due Process Clause, the Court should recognize that any erroneous failure to recuse deprives a litigant of due process and makes a resulting judgment subject to review. However, the Court, using its broad discretion in controlling its docket, need not give serious consideration to every claim of inadequate judicial disqualification but should grant review only in cases such as \textit{Caperton} where permitting a tainted jurist to sit constitutes a clear and serious violation of the norms of judicial ethics.

\textbf{I. The Road to Caperton}

\textbf{A. The Underlying Action}

\textsuperscript{9} See infra Part III.B.
\textsuperscript{10} See infra Part III.A.
\textsuperscript{11} See infra Part III.E.2 (outlining five factors for consideration when erroneous failure to disqualify violates substantive due process in spite of fair procedures for assessing disqualification motions).
\textsuperscript{12} See infra note 44 and accompanying text (discussing amicus brief filed by the Conference of Chief Justices and its suggested criteria for assessing when non-disqualification violates due process). This amicus brief, which will generally be referred to as the Chief Justices’ brief, should be distinguished from two other additional amicus briefs, one submitted by 27 former chief justices in support of Caperton and another one supporting Massey filed by ten former state justices. See infra note 45, listing amicus briefs. I shall resist the temptation to refer to the first two briefs as the “good” justices’ briefs and the latter as the “bad” justices’ brief,” but that would not be an unfair characterization. See infra Part II.D (finding \textit{Caperton} clearly correctly decided on the merits).
The Caperton v. Massey drama began when Hugh Caperton purchased the Harman Mine in southwestern Virginia in 1993. The mine contained “high-grade metallurgical coal, a hot-burning and especially pure variety that steel mills crave to fuel the blast furnaces used to make coke needed in their production process.” A.T. Massey Coal Company, led by CEO Don L. Blankenship, wanted to acquire the Harman Mine and its high-grade goal, but Caperton was unwilling to sell. Through a series of commercial and legal initiatives, which Caperton viewed as fraudulent and predatory but Massey characterized as merely aggressive business, Massey eventually drove the Harman Mining Corporation and other Caperton corporate entities into bankruptcy. “Through a series of complex, almost Byzantine transactions, including the acquisition of Harman’s prime customer and the land surrounding the competing mine, Massey both landlocked Harmon with no road or rail access and left Caperton without a market for his coal even if he could ship it.” In 1998, Caperton agreed to sell the Harman Mine to Massey but the deal collapsed down the home stretch as Massey insisted on changes that Caperton contended reflected bad faith and an attempt to ruin the Caperton interests.

Caperton’s companies (Harmon Mining Corporation, Harman Development Corporation and Sovereign Coal Sales, Inc.), filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in 1998 facing $25 million in claims. Caperton, who had personally guaranteed $1.9 million of his companies’ debt, sued Massey in West Virginia, alleging fraud and tortuous interference with contract, obtaining a $50 million jury verdict in 2002 that survived vigorous post-trial attack by Massey. The trial

---

15 See Gibeaut, supra note 13, at 52. See also Caperton, 2008 W. Va. LEXIS 22 at *7-22.
16 See Gibeaut, supra note 13, at 52.
17 The relation of the Caperton companies and Mr. Caperton is discussed at 2008 W. Va. LEXIS 22 at *7-12.
19 Id. The Caperton guarantees included interest on the unpaid amounts.
20 Other plaintiffs in the West Virginia action were Harman Development Corporation, Harman Mining Corporation, and Sovereign Coal Sales, Inc. In addition to Massey, other defendants in the case were Massey subsidiaries Elk Run Coal Co., Inc., Independence Coal Co., Inc., Marfork Coal Co., Inc., Performance Coal Co., Inc., and Massey Coal Sales Co., Inc. As in the U.S. Supreme Court’s opinion, these plaintiffs will generally be referred to as “Caperton” unless otherwise indicated. See Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., 129 S. Ct. 2252, 2257, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *9 (2009).
21 Harman Mining and Sovereign Coal also sued Wellmore, a Massey subsidiary, in Virginia for breach of contract and bad faith in connection with Wellmore’s failure to purchase Harman coal as promised, which was based on Massey’s assertion of a force majeure excuse from contract performance due to the closing of an LTV steel plant that was Wellmore’s primary customer. According to Massey counsel, Harman Mining “voluntarily withdrew” the tort claim originally pled “prior to trial in the Virginia action with assurances that [Harman] would not later assert such a claim.” The jury in the Virginia breach of contract action rendered a jury verdict of $6 million for Harman. “The appeal to the Virginia Supreme Court was refused on technical grounds.” See Brief of Respondent A.T. Massey Coal Co., in A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc. et al. v. Caperton, et al., No. 33350 (W. Va. May 4, 2007). The parties’ dispute over the preclusive effect, if any, of the Virginia action over the West Virginia action was perhaps the key issue before the West Virginia Supreme Court and was the basis for Massey’s success in the case when it involved Justice Benjamin. See infra note 38 and accompanying text.
court rejected Massey’s new trial and remittitur motions in June 2004 and in March 2005 denied Massey’s motion for judgment as a matter of law.\[^{22}\]

B. The 2004 West Virginia Supreme Court Elections

Elections for the West Virginia Supreme Court\[^{23}\] were slated for November 2004, with Justice Warren McGraw seeking re-election. Massey CEO Blankenship threw his support to challenger Brent Benjamin.\[^{24}\] Blankenship contributed the statutory maximum of $1,000 to the Benjamin campaign committee and also donated nearly $2.5 million to a political organization named “And For The Sake Of The Kids,” which opposed Justice McGraw and advocated Justice Benjamin’s election.\[^{25}\] In addition, Blankenship spent more than $500,000 independently on television and newspaper advertisements favoring Justice Benjamin as well as for fundraising on behalf of Justice Benjamin.\[^{26}\] As the U.S. Supreme Court summarized, “Blankenship’s $3 million in contributions were more than the total amount spent by all other Benjamin supporters and three times the amount spent by Benjamin’s own committee. Caperton contends that Blankenship spent $1 million more than the total amount spent by the campaign committees of both candidates combined.”\[^{27}\]

Justice Benjamin won with slightly more than 53 percent of the more than 700,000 votes cast.\[^{28}\] Although Justice McGraw appears to have had some significant electoral baggage that may have more than offset the advantage incumbents traditionally possess,\[^{29}\] the consensus of \[^{23}\] The proper name of the state’s highest court is the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. For ease of reference, this article will generally refer to it as the West Virginia Supreme Court.

---

\[^{27}\] Caperton, 129 S. Ct. at 2257, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *10-11.

\[^{28}\] See id. at 2257, *11 (“Benjamin won. He received 382,036 votes (53.3%) and McGraw received 334,301 votes (46.7%).”)

\[^{29}\] The dissenters in particular stressed McGraw’s perceived deficiencies as a candidate as part of their argument that the election outcome, and Benjamin’s purported gratitude toward Blankenship could not conclusively be said to flow from Blankenship’s massive financial support of Benjamin’s candidates. See id. at 2274, *56-57 (Roberts, C.J., joined by Scalia, Thomas and Alito, dissenting) (citations to record omitted):

It is also far from clear that Blankenship’s expenditures affected the outcome of this election. Justice Benjamin won by a comfortable 7-point margin (53.3% to 46.7%). Many observers appears to be that Blankenship’s heavy financial support was a key factor in Justice Benjamin’s election.\textsuperscript{30}

C. Review and Recusal

After the election and adjudication of post-trial motions in \textit{Caperton v. Massey}, Massey sought review of the $50 million judgment. Caperton sought Justice Benjamin’s recusal, which he denied in April 2006. According to Justice Benjamin, there was “no objective information . . . to show that this Justice has a bias for or against any litigant, that this Justice has prejudged the matters which comprise this litigation, or that this Justice will be anything but fair and impartial.”\textsuperscript{31}

In November 2007, the West Virginia high court reversed the $50 million judgment against Massey in a 3-2 decision in which Justice Benjamin joined two others for the decisive vote.\textsuperscript{32} The dissenting justices characterized the majority’s pro-Massey opinion, based on a forum selection clause and res judicata, as “new law” at odds with prior Court precedent, a convenient instance of law reform to assist Justice Benjamin’s major benefactor.\textsuperscript{33}

observers believed that Justice Benjamin’s opponent doomed his candidacy by giving a well-publicized speech that made several curious allegations; this speech was described in the local media as “deeply disturbing” and worse. Justice Benjamin’s opponent also refused to give interviews or participate in debates. All but one of the major West Virginia newspapers endorsed Justice Benjamin. Justice Benjamin just might have won because the voters of West Virginia thought he would be a better judge than his opponent. Unlike the majority, I cannot say with any degree of certainty that Blankenship “cho[se] the judge in his own cause.” I would give the voters of West Virginia more credit than that.

Although Justice Roberts’ confidence in the electorate is touching, it is at considerable odds with a substantial amount of political science literature finding that voters are extremely ill-informed in low-visibility races such as judicial elections and that advertising and campaign spending plays a particularly pivotal role in such races. \textit{See} Jeffrey W. Stempel, \textit{Malignant Democracy: Core Fallacies Underlying Election of the Judiciary}, 4 NEV. L.J. 337 (2004); \textit{RUTLEDGE}, supra note 26, at 40 (commenting that low voting rates allow special interest groups to swing campaigns and suggesting judicial voter guides as a solution); Lawrence Baum, \textit{Judicial Elections and Judicial Independence: The Voter's Perspective}, 64 OHIO ST. L.J. 13, Part III (2003) (voters in judicial elections get little information and tend to make uninformed decisions).

In addition, a review of contemporary news accounts of the hard-fought 2004 West Virginia Supreme Court election suggests that Blankenship’s financial support translated into an effective media campaign on behalf of the Benjamin candidacy. \textit{See} sources cited supra note 24.

\textit{See} sources cited supra note 24.

The West Virginia Court’s rationale was first, that a forum-selection clause contained in a contract to which Massey was not a party barred the suit in West Virginia, and second, that res judicata barred the suit due to an out-of-state judgment to which Massey was not a party. Justice Starcher dissented, stating that the “majority’s opinion is morally and legally wrong.” Justice Albright also dissented, accusing the majority of “misapplying the law and introducing sweeping ‘new law’ into our jurisprudence that may well come back to haunt us.

Caperton sought rehearing and more recusal motions followed, with Caperton and Massey moving for disqualification of three of the five justices involved in the November 2007 decision. “Photos had surfaced of [majority opinion, pro-Massey] Justice Maynard vacationing with Blankenship in the French Riviera while the case was pending. Justice Maynard granted Caperton’s recusal motion. On the other side Justice Starcher granted Massey’s recusal motion, apparently based on his public criticism of Blankenship’s role in the 2004 elections. In his recusal memorandum Justice Starcher urged Justice Benjamin to recuse himself as well as characterizing Blankenship’s sociopolitical electioneering activities as a “cancer” on the West Virginia high court.”34

Justice Benjamin again refused to recuse and also rejected a third Caperton motion for disqualification. In his capacity as acting chief justice, he was not only free to participate in the rehearing but also replaced the two recused justices.35 In April 2008, the West Virginia Supreme Court again ruled 3-2 in Massey’s favor, with Justice Benjamin again in the slim majority.36 The two justices appointed to the case by Justice Benjamin split their votes.37 Again, the two-justice dissent was strong, raising serious questions about the majority’s rulings on the substantive law.38

See Caperton, 129 S. Ct. at 2258, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *12.
34 Id. at 2258, *12-13.
35 See id. at 2258, *13.
38 See id. (noting dissent concerns), Caperton, 2008 W. Va. LEXIS 22 at *207 (Albright, J., joined by Cookman, J.) (“Not only is the majority opinion unsupported by the facts and existing case law, but it is also fundamentally unfair. Sadly, justice was neither honored nor served by the majority.”)

What distressed Justices Albright and Cookman was the Benjamin majority’s ruling that the Caperton West Virginia claims were barred because of the prior Harman Mining litigation in Virginia against Wellmore (see supra note 20). Although the West Virginia and Virginia cases are connected by virtue of the Blankenship/Massey machinations aimed at taking control of the Harman Mine, the cases largely involved different legal claims and arguments, different facts and evidence, and different parties. Consequently, only the broadest view of the “logical relationship” test for assessing res judicata would bar the West Virginia action due to Harman’s success in the Virginia lawsuit. Further, as Caperton v. Massey was argued, the controlling Virginia precedent on res judicata (applicable to the West Virginia case via choice of law principles), purported to follow the same-law-facts-evidence test rather than the logical relationship test. See Caperton, 2008 W. Va. LEXIS 22 at *134, *196-99 (W. Va. April 3, 2008) (Albright J. and Cookman, J., dissenting) (citing Virginia caselaw on res judicata, including Davis v. Marshall Homes, Inc., 576 S.E.2d 504 (Va. 2003)). See generally Richard L. Marcus, et al., Civil Procedure: A Modern Approach 1094-97 (5th ed. 2009)(outlining established approaches to determining res judicata); Fleming James, Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr. & John Leubsdorf, Civil Procedure Ch. 11 (5th ed. 2001)(comprehensive review of topic). The other successful ground in Massey’s challenge to the $50 million verdict was the assertion that a forum selection clause in a Wellmore-Harman Mining contract controlled and that Massey, which was not a party to that contract, had standing to enforce the clause. See 2008 W. Va. LEXIS 22 at *23-29. The clause in question provides that the Wellmore-Harman Mining [...]reement, in all respects, shall be governed, construed and enforced in accordance with the substantive laws of the Commonwealth of Virginia. All actions brought in connection with this Agreement shall be filed in and decided by the Circuit Court of Buchanan County, Virginia.

See id. at *24-25.

A full discussion of the merits of Massey’s res judicata and forum selection arguments lies beyond the scope of this article. However, even a brief look at these issues suggest that the West Virginia decision favoring and complaints about Justice Benjamin’s refusal to recuse pursuant to the West Virginia Code of Judicial Conduct and the Due Process Clause.39

D. The Supreme Court Intervenes

Caperton successfully sought certiorari.40 By this time, the case had become widely discussed in the media.41 It was thoroughly briefed,42 including amicus briefs from the American Massey is problematic and open to criticism. For example, the West Virginia Supreme Court majority’s discussion of the forum selection clause issue, despite its length, is shockingly bad in that it fails to grapple with the key question: is the Caperton fraud and tortuous interference action brought in West Virginia sufficiently closely connected to the Wellmore-Harman Mine breach of contract action that it also was required to be brought in Buchanan County, Virginia?

The West Virginia Caperton majority simply glosses over this question in a manner that would dismay a law professor reading student exams in that resembles 20 pages of a mediocre student answer that fails to address the determinative and most difficult question posed. Rather than reflect seriously on the issue, the West Virginia majority instead opts for the “C” students’ trick of showering the reader with statements of doctrine unmoored from the context of the case. My own view is that the term “in connection with,” although perhaps not narrow, is far less sweeping that phrases such as “relating to” or “arising out of” typically found in forum selection clauses. Consequently, it is to me not at all obvious that the Caperton fraud action needed to be brought in Buchanan County, Virginia.

More substantively, the issue is whether the Virginia contract action, which involved Massey and Blankenship’s allegedly unfounded assertion of a force majeure exception to performing the Wellmore contract with Harman Mine, was sufficiently intertwined with the larger Massey-Blankenship efforts to bring down Caperton to require that the second suit be subject to the Buchanan County forum requirement. Although there was of course a connection between Massey’s alleged improper breach of contract and other Massey actions against Caperton (they were all part of a “get Caperton” effort), many or perhaps most courts would view the West Virginia’s court’s enforcement of the forum selection clause as an example of the Wellmore contract “tail” wagging the Massey-conspiracy-against-Caperton “dog” and would not find the clause to reach so far (even if one gets over the substantial hurdle of letting Massey, a nonparty to the Wellmore-Harman contract, enforce the clause).

On the merits, the West Virginia majority’s decision is open to serious question and will appear to be downright wrong to many civil procedure scholars and practicing lawyers. Caperton v. Massey was thus not a case in which it could be said that the correct result was so clear that it precluded concern that lack of neutrality by a judge may have played a critical role in the outcome.

Bar Association (which supported Caperton) and the Conference of Chief Justices, which suggested a list of relevant factors for consideration in assessing due process recusal claims (and that effectively provided tacit support to Caperton) as well as 15 other amici. Although the judge may be constitutionally disqualified from presiding over a particular matter for reason other than actual bias or a financial interest in the outcome. These two categories alone are simply not broad enough to assure the due-process guarantee, which protects the right to a fair hearing if extreme facts create a “probability of actual bias * * * too high to be constitutionally tolerable,” encompasses concerns about “possible temptation to the average * * * judge,” “probability of unfairness,” and not being “likely to maintain that calm detachment” necessary for a judge to deliver a fair adjudication. In particular, political support for a judge may be so extremely extraordinary that due-process concerns are implicated.

Id. at 4-5 (footnotes omitted, citing To with v. Larkin, 421 U.S. 35, 47 (1975); Tumey v. Ohio, 273, U.S. 510, 532 (1927); and In re Murchison, 349 U.S. 133, 136 (1955)).

In particular, the Chief Justices suggested that the Court consider the following “Criteria for evaluating whether due process requires recusal for campaign spending in a particular case.” See id. at 24 (capitalization removed).

• Size of the Expenditure
• Nature of the Support
• Timing of the Support
• Effectiveness of the Support
• Nature of the Supporter’s Prior Political Activities
• Nature of the Supporter’s Pre-existing Relationship with the Judge
• Relationship Between the Supporter and the Litigant.

See id. at 24-29. The ABA Amicus Brief, supra note 43, supported a similar use of similar factors. See id. at 19-20 (factors include contribution size, importance, timing, and relationship of judge and supporter). In addition, the ABA Brief noted former Justice Sandra Day O’Conner’s strong concern over the issue. See id. at 3 (citing Sandra Day O’Connor, Op-Ed., Justice for Sale, WALL ST. J., Nov. 15, 2007, at A25). Justice O’Connor was sufficiently interested in the outcome of the case that she attended the Caperton oral argument.

Although the Chief Justices brief did not expressly support either side, its overall message is one favorable to Caperton and it clearly had substantial influence on the majority opinion.

Of the 17 amicus briefs, eleven expressly supported Caperton while five expressly supported Massey, with the Chief Justice’s amicus brief not taking a position but articulating concerns and an approach that favored Caperton. See Brief of the Conference of Chief Justices, supra note 44 (supporting neither party but implicitly favoring Caperton). See:

Brief for 27 Former Chief Justices and Justices as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioners, Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., No. 08-22, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 (Jan. 2, 2009) (former Chief Justices C.C. Torbert (Ala.); David Newbern (Ark.); Norman Fletcher (Ga.); Charles McDevitt (Id.); Byron Johnson (Id.); Harry T. Lemon (La.); Conrad L. Mallett, Jr. (Mich.); A.M. Keith (Minn.); Kathleen Blatz (Minn.); Russell Anderson (Minn.); Edward D. Robertson, Jr. (Mo.); Jean A. Turnage (Mont.); John Sheehy (Mont.); Robert Rose (Nev.); James Exum (No. Car.); I. Beverly Lake, Jr. (No. Car.); Herbert L. Meschke (N.D.); Beryl Levine (N.D.); Herbert R. Brown (Ohio); Edwin J. Peterson (Ore.); John P. Flaherty (Pa.); Raul Gonzalez (Tex.); Robert Utter (Wash.); Vernon Pearson (Wash.); Richard Neely (W. Va.) and Louis Butler (Wis.));

Brief for Center for Political Accountability and the Carol and Lawrence Zicklin Center for Business Ethics Research as Amici Curiae Supporting Petitioners, Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., No. 08-22, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 (Jan. 2, 2009);

Brief for American Academy of Appellate Lawyers as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioners, Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., No. 08-22, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 (Jan. 5, 2009);

Brief for Justice at Stake et al. as Amici Curiae Supporting Petitioner, Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., No. 08-22, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 (Jan. 5, 2009);

Brief for American Bar Association as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioners, Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., No. 08-22, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 (Jan. 5, 2009);

Brief for the Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law, the Campaign Legal Center, and the Reform Institute as Amici Curiae Supporting Petitioners, Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., No. 08-22, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 (Jan. 5, 2009);

Brief for American Association for Justice as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioners, Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., No. 08-22, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 (Jan. 5, 2009);

Brief for Center for Competitive Politics as Amicus Curiae Supporting Respondents, Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., No. 08-22, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 (Feb. 4, 2009);

Brief for Law Professors Ronald R. Rotunda and Michael R. Dimino as Amici Curiae Supporting Respondents, Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., No. 08-22, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 (undated);

Brief for James Madison Center for Free Speech as Amicus Curiae Supporting Respondents, Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., No. 08-22, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 (Feb. 4, 2009);

Chief Justices’ brief stopped short of endorsing reversal, it connotatively favored Caperton in that it listed as an important factor the magnitude of collective campaign support for a challenged judge.\textsuperscript{46} Caperton’s case was argued by former U.S. Solicitor General Theodore Olson\textsuperscript{47} while Massey retained prominent Supreme Court advocate Andrew Frey.\textsuperscript{48}

In June 2009, the Court by a 5-4 majority sided with Caperton and vacated the decision reversing his $50 million judgment.\textsuperscript{49} The Court observed > that there is serious risk of actual bias – based on objective and reasonable perceptions – when a person with a personal stake in a particular case had a significant and disproportionate influence in placing the judge on the case by raising funds or directing the judge’s election campaign when the case was pending or imminent. The inquiry centers on the contribution’s relative size in comparison to the total amount of money contributed to the campaign, the total amount spent in the election, and the apparent effect such contribution had on the outcome of the election.

Applying this principle, we conclude that Blankenship’s campaign efforts had a significant and disproportionate influence in placing Justice Benjamin on the case.\textsuperscript{50}

E. Caperton’s Test for Determining When Recusal is Required by the Due Process Clause

The Blankenship-Benjamin situation violated the Due Process Clause, according to the majority, in that it raised for the reasonable lay observer the significant probability that Justice Benjamin could not be fair in assessing such an important case implicating his sponsor Blankenship’s finances.\textsuperscript{51} Reviewing the Court’s due process-disqualification precedents, the Court found that Blankenship’s campaign support was of sufficient magnitude to be uncomfortably close to the type of personal judicial financial self-interest in past cases that had merited judicial recusal.\textsuperscript{52}

The majority reviewed the key precedents and concluded they supported recusal in Caperton.\textsuperscript{53} It divided past Court precedent on due process disqualification into two broad categories. The first was where a judge had a “direct, personal, substantial pecuniary interest” in

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{46} See supra note 44.
  \item \textsuperscript{47} See supra note 42. See generally Transcript of Oral Argument, Caperton, 129 S. Ct. 2252, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157.
  \item \textsuperscript{48} See note supra 42. See generally Transcript of Oral Argument, supra note 47.
  \item \textsuperscript{49} See 129 S. Ct. at 2267, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *38-39.
  \item \textsuperscript{50} See id. at 2262-64, *24-29.
  \item \textsuperscript{51} See id. at 2262-64, *24-30.
  \item \textsuperscript{52} See id. at 2262-63, *24-28.
\end{itemize}
a case, a situation reflected in the long-standing Anglo-American axiom that no person should be “allowed to be a judge in his own cause; because his interest would certainly bias his judgment, and not improbably, corrupt his integrity.”\(^{54}\) This basis for disqualification, embracing a recusal standard going back to Blackstonian England, has been expressly recognized since Tumey v. Ohio was decided in 1927.\(^{55}\) Operationalizing the standard in Tumey, the Court stated that where the judge “had a financial interest in the outcome of a case, although the interest was less than what would have been considered personal or direct at common law” he must recuse.\(^{56}\) The second established category where due process required recusal was “where a judge had no pecuniary interest in the case but was challenged because of a conflict arising from his participation in an earlier proceeding.”\(^{57}\) This approach has been recognized since In re Murchison in 1955.\(^{58}\)

Although the Court had not previously found due process to require recusal due to election campaign support, the Caperton result is quite consistent with Tumey and its progeny. For example, in the 1986 Aetna v. Lavoie decision,\(^{59}\) the Court found that an Alabama Supreme Court justice’s participation in a case that could set favorable precedent for his similar suit against an insurer was the type of financial interest that merited disqualification under the Due Process Clause.\(^{60}\) The Caperton majority viewed campaign financial support as something other \(^{54}\) See Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510 (1927).

\(^{55}\) See Caperton, 129 S. Ct. at 2259, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *17 (citing Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510, 520 (1927) as the seminal case in this category. In Tumey, the village mayor sat as a judge in trying alcohol violations, receiving extra compensation from his judicial duties that was funded by fines assessed for conviction. The Tumey Court concluded that this presented the mayor with an unconstitutional conflict of interest).

\(^{57}\) See In re Murchison, 349 U.S. 133 (1955).

\(^{58}\) See Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 475 U.S. 813 (1986).

\(^{59}\) See id. at 825. Commentators generally supported the Lavoie holding and rationale. See, e.g., Jeffrey W. Stempel, Rehnquist, Recusal, and Reform, 53 BROOK. L. REV. 589, 640 (1987); S. Matthew Cook, Note, Extending the Due Process Clause to Prevent a Previously Recused Judge from Later Attempting to Affect the Case from Which He was Recused, 1997 BYU L. REV. 423, 441-42 (1997); Ignazio J. Ruvolo, California’s Amendment to Canon 3E of the Code of Judicial Conduct Requiring Self-Recusal of Disqualified Appellate Justices – Will it be Reversible Error Not to Self-Recuse?, 25 T. JEFFERSON L. REV. 529, 551 (2003). The decision, however, caused comparatively little stir when rendered, which arguably suggests that the Caperton dissenters (see infra Part II.B) are excessively concerned that Caperton will create a huge upsurge in recusal motions and related appeals and certiorari petitions.

\(^{60}\) Arguably, however, Justice Benjamin’s nonrecusal did violate this norm. Judges who are not re-elected lose their jobs and their income. Although the Court focused on Justice Benjamin’s potential gratitude toward Blankenship, the opposite side of the coin is relevant. Just as Blankenship could be instrumental in advancing a Benjamin candidacy, he could also just as easily turn and help defeat a Benjamin re-election campaign if displeased with his Benjamin’s failure to perform as anticipated. Career objectives are pecuniary objectives. Even though Justice Benjamin would not directly benefit from the outcome of Caperton v. Massey on the merits, it is only a small step to an impact on his career and compensation should he support an outcome adverse to Blankenship or a similarly well-heeled contributor. Obviously, this reverse side of the coin can be pushed too far. A judge should not be disqualified, for example, simply because a litigant with whom there is no prior relationship is powerful and might oppose the judge in an ensuing election. But where the judge has already enjoyed vast sums of support from an interested party, both the gratitude and retaliation concerns become sufficiently concrete to counsel recusal.

I acknowledge the inconvenient fact that many judges leaving the bench, even involuntarily, will often or even perhaps usually be able to make more money in private practice. But even these judges ordinarily want very badly to retain their judicial posts. They left practice for the bench for a reason and their set of preferences is unlikely to have changed. In addition, there are some judges who, if defeated, might not do as well in practice. One than the type of direct pecuniary interest that made a jurist a “judge in his own case.” Nonetheless, the majority found the Benjamin nonrecusal fell easily within the zone of cases requiring recusal on due process grounds.

The proper constitutional inquiry is “whether sitting on the case then before the [court] would offer a possible temptation to the average judge to . . . lead him not to hold the balance nice, clear, and true.” By this standard, Justice Benjamin’s recusal was clearly required. The average judge presiding over a very important ($50 million) case to a very substantial benefactor ($3 million) would of course be tempted to be biased in favor of the benefactor and prejudiced against his litigation opponent.

II. Assessing Caperton

A. The “Reasonable Question as to Impartiality” Standard for Non-constitutional Recusal Under Federal and State Law As Contrasted with the Constitutional Due Process Standard of a “Probability of Actual Bias.”

Justice Benjamin was also clearly disqualified under then operative Canon 3(E)(1) of the West Virginia and ABA Codes of Judicial Conduct (now Rule 2.11 in the 2007 revision to the ABA Judicial Code) in that his impartiality was subject to reasonable question. Rule 2.11, the substance of which has been essentially the same since the 1972 Model Code, provides that “[a] judge shall disqualify himself or herself in any proceeding in which the judge’s impartiality might be reasonably questioned,” enumerating specific examples of when disqualification is required. The ABA has in effect stated that in the enumerated situations, many of which seem common criticism of direct election of judges is that it can result in the election of lawyers who pursue the bench because their practices have not been successful. By contrast, nearly all appointed judges, whatever their other talents or shortcomings, have enjoyed success in private practice or government lawyering. For former government lawyers, ascension to the bench may be a net gain in compensation, especially if pension benefits and health insurance are considered.

63 Rule 2.11 listed the “following circumstances” in which the judge shall recuse when:

(1) The judge has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party or a party’s lawyer, or personal knowledge of facts that are in dispute in the proceeding.

(2) The judge knows that the judge, the judge’s spouse or domestic partner, or a person within the third degree of relationship to either of them, or the spouse or domestic partner of such a person is:
far less troublesome than Blankenship’s campaign support of Justice Benjamin, reasonable question as to impartiality is a given. Impartiality is defined as the “absence of bias or prejudice in favor of or against, particular parties or classes of parties, as well as maintenance of an open mind in considering issues that may come before a judge.”

(a) a party to the proceeding, or an officer, director, general partner, managing member, or trustee of a party;

(b) acting as a lawyer in the proceeding.

(c) a person who has more than a de minimus interest that could be substantially affected by the proceeding; or

(d) likely to be a material witness in the proceeding.

(3) The judge knows that he or she, individually or as a fiduciary, or the judge’s spouse, domestic partner, parent, or child, or any other member of the judge’s family residing in the judge’s household, has an economic interest in the subject matter in controversy or is a party to the proceeding.

(4) The judge knows or learns by means of a timely motion that a party, a party’s lawyer, or the law firm of a party’s lawyer, has within the previous [insert number] year[s] made aggregate contributions to the judge’s campaign in an amount that is greater than $[insert amount] for an individual or $ [insert amount] for an entity [is reasonable and appropriate for an individual or an entity].

(5) The judge, while a judge or a judicial candidate, has made a public statement, other than in a court proceeding, judicial decision, or opinion, that commits or appears to commit the judge to reach a particular result or rule in a particular way in the proceeding or controversy.

(6) The judge:

(a) served as a lawyer in the matter in controversy, or was associated with a lawyer who participated substantially as a lawyer in the matter during such association;

(b) served in government employment, and in such capacity participated personally and substantially as a lawyer or public official concerning the proceeding or has publicly expressed in such capacity an opinion concerning the merits of the particular matter in controversy;

(c) was a material witness concerning the matter; or

(c) previously presided as a judge over the matter in another court.

See ABA MODEL CODE OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT R. 2.11(A)(1)-(6) (2007) (asterisks for defined terms eliminated) (Terminology section of Model Code defines terms such as aggregate, domestic partner, fiduciary, impartiality, “know,” and personal knowledge). Rule 2.11 (B) requires the judge to keep reasonably informed about his and his family’s financial interests. Rule 2.11(C) permits the parties to agree to the judge’s continued participation in the case, provided that there is no Rule 2.11(A)(1) ground for disqualification on the basis of personal bias or prejudice toward attorney or litigant or the judge’s personal knowledge of disputed facts.

Case law interpreting the ABA Code’s “reasonable question regarding impartiality” standard and equivalent language in the federal judicial code generally views a judge as disqualified if a reasonable layperson aware of the relevant facts would harbor significant doubt about the judge’s ability to be impartial. Consequently, disqualification based on a violation of due process is somewhat different than disqualification under the ABA Judicial Code and state analogs or under 28 U.S.C. §455(a)(the general federal disqualification statute) which in language similar to the ABA Model Code states that “[a]ny justice, judge or magistrate of the United States shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned.” In a manner similar to the Model Code’s disqualification provision, §455(b) lists a number of specific instances (essentially the same as those of the Model Code) where disqualification is required, codifying particular circumstances that create a per se question as to a judge’s impartiality.

Again, as with the Model Code, the particular instances where disqualification has been required under federal statutory law present circumstances that, for many a reasonable observer, must seem to pose far less risk of bias than Justice Benjamin’s receipt of $3 million in campaign aid from the CEO of a litigant appearing before him in an important case. Put another way, one might ask which is more troubling: Justice Benjamin’s situation or Mrs. Benjamin owning a share of stock in Massey? Although the latter should not be minimized, particularly if she owns a significant amount of stock, disqualification of Justice Benjamin would have been required if she owned a single share of Massey. Yet Justice Benjamin saw no problem participating in Capterton when the problem was not a trivial investment but instead involved $3 million in key campaign support.

of bias for or against either party to the proceeding.” (emphasis in original). See also id. at 775-76 (citations omitted):

Impartiality in this sense assures equal application of the law. That is, it guarantees a party that the judge who hears his case will apply the law to him in the same way he applies it to any other party. This is the traditional sense in which the term is used. . . . It is also the sense in which it is used in the cases cited by respondents [the State of Minnesota defendants] and amici for the proposition that an impartial judges is essential to due process.

66 See FLAMM, supra note 7, §§ 5.6.4, 5.7; ALFINI ET AL., supra note 7, Ch. 4; LESLIE W. ABRAMSON, JUDICIAL DISQUALIFICATION UNDER CANON 3 OF THE CODE OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT (2d ed. 1992); Stempel, Chief William’s Ghost, supra note 63; Bassett, supra note 7, at 1227; John Leubsdorf, Theories of Judging and Judicial Disqualification, 62 N.Y.U. L. REV. 237 (1987). See, e.g., Liljeberg v. Health Services Acquisition Corp., 486 U.S. 847 (1988) (applying this standard to disqualify federal trial judge who sat on board of university that stood to profit from land sale if particular party prevailed in dispute over right to build hospital); Potashnick v. Port City Const. Co., 609 F.2d 1101 (5th Cir. 1980) (judge faced with disqualification motion should consider how participation in a given case appears to average citizen); United States v. Ferguson, 550 F. Supp. 1256, 1259-60 (S.D.N.Y. 1982) (“The issue [of impartiality] . . . is not the Court’s own introspective capacity to sit in fair and honest judgment with respect to controverted issues, but whether a reasonable member of the public at large, aware of all the facts, might fairly question the Court’s impartiality.”).

68 See 28 U.S.C. § 455(b)(1)-(5) (requiring recusal in essentially the same specific circumstances delineated in the Rule 2.11 of the Model Code. See supra note 64, quoting relevant section of Rule 2.11. Section 455(e) provides that where these enumerated grounds apply, the parties may not agree to let the judge preside but, like Rule 2.11(c), federal law permits the parties to waive disqualification and agree to permit the judge to preside even if his impartiality might be subject to question.
Although there are some minor differences between the Model Code and §455(a), they are the same regarding the core standard governing a judge’s eligibility to hear and decide cases.
Under the Judicial Code and §455(a), the reviewing court asks whether the judge’s impartiality may be reasonably questioned. Under a due process analysis, the inquiry is similar but disqualification is harder to obtain in that the Court’s precedents appear to require not just reasonable question as to impartiality but a probability of bias. At least this appears to be the _Caperton_ majority’s approach.

In defining these standards [for required due process recusal rather than general disqualification] the Court has asked whether, “under a realistic appraisal of psychological tendencies, and human weakness,” the interest “poses such a risk of actual bias or prejudgment that the practice must be forbidden if the guarantee of due process is to be adequately implemented.”

Applied to the instant matter, the Court found that there is a serious risk of actual bias – based on objective and reasonable perceptions – when a person with a personal stake in a particular case had a significant and disproportionate influence in placing the judge on the case by raising funds or directing the judge’s election campaign when the case was pending or imminent. The inquiry centers on the contribution’s relative size in comparison to the total amount of money contributed to the campaign, the total amount spent in the election, and the apparent effect such contribution had on the outcome of the election.

---

69 For example, 28 U.S.C. § 455(d) defines several key terms such as “fiduciary” and “financial interest” in the statute itself rather than referring to a terminology section.

Regarding waiver, 28 U.S.C. § 455(e) permits the parties to agree to let a judge subject to § 455(a) hear the case but forbids such stipulations if one of the § 455(b) grounds for recusal applies, most of which involve financial interest of the judge or a family member. The strong federal bar to litigant consent when a judge has even modest financial conflict is in part a legacy of now-disparaged past practice in which a judge would announce that he owned stock in a litigant company and then actively sought litigant consent to his continued involvement, placing lawyers and parties in an awkward position should they refuse to consent. The great Learned Hand allegedly used this approach so regularly that the tactic acquired the name “velvet blackjack.” _See_ JOHN P. MACKENZIE, _THE APPEARANCE OF JUSTICE_ Ch. 4 (1974); Jeffrey W. Stempel, _Rehnquist, Recusal, and Reform_, supra note 59, at 631

However, federal law also differs from the Model Code in that § 455(f) specifically provides that if “substantial judicial time has been devoted” to a case, then a § 455(b) problem is discovered and recusal is not required “if the justice, judge, magistrate, bankruptcy judge, spouse or minor child, as the case may be, divests himself or herself of the interest that provides the grounds for disqualification.”

70 _See_ Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., 129 S. Ct. 2252, 2263, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *28 (2009), citing
Withrow v. Larkin, 421 U.S. 35, 47 (1975) and drawing upon Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 475 U.S. 813 (1986);
U.S. 455 (1971); _In re Murchison_, 349 U.S. 133 (1955); _FTC v. Cement Institute_, 333 U.S. 683 (1948); and _Tumey
Applying this principle, we conclude that Blankenship’s campaign efforts had a significant and disproportionate influence in placing Justice Benjamin on the case. 71

Responding to the dissent’s criticism that a decision favoring Caperton would open the floodgates to vast tracts of recusal litigation, the majority noted that earlier due process disqualification decisions had not had this effect72 and emphasized the particularities of the instant case.

Our decision today addresses an extraordinary situation where the Constitution requires recusal. Massey and its amici predict that various adverse consequences will follow from recognizing a constitutional violation here – ranging from a flood of recusal motions to unnecessary interference with judicial elections. We disagree. The facts now before us are extreme by any measure. The parties point to no other instance involving judicial campaign contributions that presents a potential for bias comparable to the circumstances in this case.73

While acknowledging that “extreme cases often test the bounds of established legal principles” and that “sometimes no administrable standard may be available to address the perceived wrong” the majority concluded that in extreme cases intervention was required to protect the integrity of the legal system.74 Referring to three “illustrative” past cases of such intervention, the majority found that “[i]n each case the Court dealt with extreme facts that created an unconstitutional probability of bias that “cannot be defined with precision” but that in each case “the Court articulated an objective standard to protect the parties’ basic right to a fair trial in a fair tribunal” with the Court “careful to distinguish the extreme facts of the cases before it from those interests that would not rise to a constitutional level.”75

The Caperton majority took pains not only to state that due process-required recusal would continue to be rare but also that the standard for due process recusal was distinctly higher than the standard for ordinary disqualification.

71 See 129 S. Ct. at 2264, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *29.
72 See id. at 2266, *35:

[i]t is worth noting the effects, or lack thereof, of the Court’s prior decisions. Even though the standards announced in those cases raised questions similar to those that might be asked after our decision today, the Court was not flooded with [Ward v. ] Monroeville [409 U.S. 57 (1972)] or [In re] Murchison [349 U.S. 133 (1955)] motions. That is perhaps due in part to the extreme facts those standards sought to address. Courts proved quite capable of applying standards to less extreme situations.

See also id. at, 2266, *35-36 (noting that trend in state judicial reforms has strengthened disqualification law and citing West Virginia Code of Judicial Conduct Canon 3E(1) and 28 U.S.C. § 455(a) as examples.
73 See 129 S. Ct. at 2265, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *33-34.
74 See id. at 2265, *34.
“The Due Process Clause demarks only the outer boundaries of judicial disqualifications. Congress and the states, of course, remain free to impose more rigorous standards for judicial disqualification than those we find mandated here today.” Because the codes of judicial conduct provide more protection than due process requires, most disputes over disqualification will be resolved without resort to the Constitution. Application of the constitutional standard implicated in this case will thus be confined to rare instances.76

Further, in announcing its campaign support recusal position, the Court greatly emphasized whether a case was “pending” or “imminent” at the time an interested party supported the judge under scrutiny. For example, Justice Benjamin’s recusal might not have been required had Caperton v. Massey commenced after his election, even though Don Blankenship would be just as interested in the case outcome and would have been just a pivotal a figure in Benjamin’s career. Further, Blankenship would have had just as much potential to extract vengeance against Justice Benjamin if Blankenship was displeased with Benjamin’s vote. A benefactor wealthy enough to provide $3 million presumably has the wherewithal to provide a similar amount to a future opponent thought more hospitable to his or his company’s interests.

Given the narrowness of the Caperton holding and the majority’s repeated attempts to set the decision in a far corner of the field of judicial disqualification, it is unsurprising that one leading authority on judicial ethics characterized the decision has “declaring that a judge’s decision not to recuse violates due process ‘when it’s a cold day in hell.’”77 Former Texas Supreme Court Chief Justice Thomas Phillips likewise viewed Caperton as unlikely to open the floodgates, emphasizing the majority’s “very narrow standard” and the unusual facts of the case.78 Professor Roy Schotland, co-author of the Chief Justices amicus brief, called it “preposterous” to predict an explosion of recusal motions based on Caperton.79 In particular, as another co-author of the Chief Justices brief observed, although Caperton may permit more due process-based recusal arguments than could have been made prior to June 2009, parties seeking recusal have always possessed the option of seeking disqualification based on the ABA Model Code or federal statute,80 both which provide broader grounds and a lower threshold for recusal

B. The Dissenters’ Perspective in Caperton

Notwithstanding its rather restrained approach to the problem of when failures of judicial disqualification violate due process, Caperton divided the Court, engendering dissents by Chief 76 See 129 S. Ct. at 2267, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *38 (italics in original), quoting Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 475 U.S. 813, 828 (1986). The Caperton majority opinion can be properly criticized as less than crystal clear regarding the differences between recusal under 28 U.S.C § 455(a) and the Judicial Code. At times the opinion appears to suggest that the general “reasonable question as to impartiality” standard used in non-constitutional disqualification motions also governs the inquiry into whether due process has been violated. At other junctures, the majority states that something more (probability of bias as opposed to reasonable question of impartiality) is required to support recusal on due process grounds as opposed to nonconstitutional recusal.

77 See Caperton Ruling May Spur States to Enhance Their Process for Judges’ Recusal, 25 LAW. MAN. PROF. CONDUCT 335, at 4 (quoting University of Indiana law professor Charles Geyh).
78 See id. (quoting Phillips).
79 See id. (quoting Georgetown law professor Roy Schotland).
80 See id. (quoting Washington, D.C. attorney George Patton Jr.).
Justice Roberts (joined by Justices Scalia, Thomas, and Alito) and Justice Scalia. The dissenters appear to have a dramatically different view of human nature and the risk that a judge will be influenced by even massive political and economic support by a litigant appearing before the judge. Largely, however, the Roberts dissent attacks the majority approach as too indeterminant and unpredictable, which the dissent contends to be a sufficient problem to auger in favor of refusing to intervene in state court disqualification decisions of this type, no matter how bad it may look to a casual newspaper reader.

In his dissent, Chief Justice Roberts outlines a long series of particular questions. Notwithstanding the important line-drawing point at the center of the dissent, it appears that all of these forty questions can be adequately addressed. Although precise lines cannot be drawn in the absence of concrete cases, a series of presumptive guidelines suggest themselves for application of due process disqualification. One might also criticize the Roberts dissent for engaging in a bit of “straw man” argumentation in that it announces an unnecessary goal (laying out an encyclopedic view of due process qualification that enunciates particularized rules of application for every conceivable future dispute on the matter) and then criticizes the majority for not meeting the dissenters’ perhaps unwise goal. In another context, judicial 82 See id. at 2274, *57 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

83 See id. at 2267, 2269, *39, *44 (“at the most basic level, it is unclear whether the new probability of bias standard is somehow limited to financial support in judicial elections, or applies to judicial recusal questions.” Also noting “other fundamental questions as well” and listing 40 such question, 80 questions if one counts subparts).
84 See id. at 2267, *39-40 (“The Court’s new ‘rule’ provides no guidance to judges and litigants about when recusal will be constitutionally required. This will inevitably lead to an increase in allegations that judges are biased, however groundless those charges may be. The end result will do far more to erode public confidence in judicial impartiality than an isolated failure to recuse in a particular case.”).
85 See Jeffrey W. Stempel, Playing Forty Questions: A Brief Response to Justice Roberts’ Concerns in Caperton and Some Tentative Answers About Operationalizing Judicial Recusal and Due Process __ SOUTHWESTERN L. REV. __ (2009) (forthcoming). See Caperton Ruling May Spur States, supra note 77, at 5 (law professor Charles Geyh, a Reporter for the 2007 ABA Model Judicial Code, describes concerns raised in Roberts dissent questions as “alarmist,” contending there is only “remote” risk of difficulties concerning the dissenters). See also id. at 4 (law professor Schotland views dissent’s prediction of doom as “preposterous” but concedes that some Roberts dissent question posed reasonable questions that may need to be answered in future cases).
87 Straw man is defined as “[a] tenuous and exaggerated counterargument that an advocate puts forth for the sole purpose of disproving it.” BLACK’S LAW DICTIONARY 1461 (8th ed. 2004). Having erected a straw man that is less attractive or compelling than the actual argument opposed, the speaker then proceeds to “knock down” this weaker target but in doing so is largely destroying something other than the argument that was supposed to be at issue.
88 During the past decade, the concept of judicial minimalism has gained a substantial following. See CASS R. SUNSTEIN, ONE CASE AT A TIME: JUDICIAL MINIMALISM ON THE SUPREME COURT (1999); Christopher J. Peters, Assessing the New Judicial Minimalism, 100 COLUM. L. REV. 1454 (2000); Jay D. Wexler, Defending the Middle Way: Intermediate Scrutiny as Judicial Minimalism, 66 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 298 (1998). The concept has also become part of the public discussion surrounding Judge Sonia Sotomayor’s nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court. See, e.g., David D. Kirkpatrick, Judge’s Mentor: Part Guide, Part Foil, N.Y. TIMES, June 22, 2009, at A1 (article portrays Judge Sotomayor as a judicial minimalist, an image the Obama administration appears to promote in order to help her ultimately successful confirmation by refuting charges that she is a judicial activist; quoting former Yale Law Dean and Second Circuit Judge Guido Calabresi describing Sotomayor approach in controversial case as one of “judicial minimalism”).
conservatives like Justices Roberts, Scalia, Thomas and Alito might well label such a project as an impermissible advisory opinion.\textsuperscript{89}

In addition to questioning the feasibility of Supreme Court policing of campaign-related state court failures to recuse, the Roberts dissent is a utilitarian attack, contending that whatever benefit is derived from correcting Justice Benjamin’s ethical myopia is outweighed by the anticipated avalanche of less meritorious disqualification motions, both because it will add to judicial workload and because it will create in the public unfounded concern about the neutrality of judges.\textsuperscript{90} Concluding, Justice Roberts expressed his view that “opening the door to [due process-based] recusal claims” based on an “amorphous ‘probability of bias,’ will itself bring our judicial system into undeserved disrepute, and diminish the confidence of the American people in the fairness and integrity of their courts.”\textsuperscript{91}

Justice Scalia’s lone dissent expressed similar cost-benefit concerns in more strident terms. Rejecting the contention that there was net benefit to setting aside the tainted Massey victory, Justice Scalia argued that the majority “decision will have the opposite effect.”\textsuperscript{92} He contended, without benefit of any cited empirical evidence, that “[w]hat above all else is eroding public confidence in the Nation’s judicial system is the perception that litigation is just a game, that the party with the most resourceful lawyer can play it to win, that our seemingly interminable legal proceedings are wonderfully self-perpetuating but incapable of delivering real-world justice.”\textsuperscript{93} According to Justice Scalia, the majority opinion “will reinforce that perception, adding to the fast arsenal of lawyerly gambits what will come to be known as the Caperton claim”\textsuperscript{94} producing an attendant sharp rise in disputing costs and further drain on the judicial system.\textsuperscript{95} To Justice Scalia, “[t]he relevant question . . . is whether we do more good than harm by seeking to correct this imperfection through expansion of our constitutional mandate in a manner ungoverned by any discernable rule [and the] answer is obvious.”\textsuperscript{96}

\textbf{C. The Unpersuasive Criticisms of Caperton}

\textsuperscript{89} Under the ground rules of justiciability, courts (in particular the U.S. Supreme Court), are to refrain from rendering advisory opinions. See JOHNN E. NOWAK & RONALD D. ROTUNDA, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW \textsection 2.12 (6\textsuperscript{th} ed. 2000) (overview of justiciability doctrines and general prohibition on advisory opinions). Conservative jurists are generally viewed as particularly supportive of this doctrine because it tends to reduce the degree to which judicial decisions may amplify or contradict actions of the legislative or executive branch.

\textsuperscript{90} See Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., 129 S. Ct. 2252, 2267, 2272-73, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *39-40, *53-55 (2009) (stressing presumption of judicial impartiality and need to foster respect for courts as well as citing “cautionary tale” of Court’s short-lived willingness to permit double jeopardy attacks in civil litigation, leading to many novel claims that forced retreat on the issue and confinement of double jeopardy issues to criminal proceedings).

\textsuperscript{91} See id. at 2274, *57.

\textsuperscript{92} See id. at 2274-75, *57, *58-59.

\textsuperscript{93} See id.

\textsuperscript{94} See id.

\textsuperscript{95} See id. (The facts relevant to adjudicating it will have to be litigate – and likewise the law governing it, which will be indeterminate for years to come, if not forever. Many billable hours will be spent in pouring through volumes of campaign finance reports, and many more in contesting nonrecusal decisions through every available means.).

\textsuperscript{96} See id.
Although commentators generally approved the Caperton holding, several prominent commentators, echoing the arguments of the dissent, challenged its prudence and practicality, as well as the correctness of its decision to vacate the West Virginia Supreme Court’s decision in which the justice receiving $3 million in campaign support cast the deciding vote. Initial

---

See, e.g., Edit., Honest Justice, N.Y. TIMES, June 9, 2009, at A22, (praising Caperton holding and “recognition of the threat posed by outsized contributions” and its “crucial statement that judges and justice are not for sale” while finding problems raised by Roberts dissent “exaggerated.”); Edit., The Supreme Court Raises the Bar for Judges, L.A. TIMES, July 9, 2009, available at www.latimes.com/news/opinion/editorials/la-ed-scotus9-2009jun09.0,1381063.story (approving Caperton holding and finding Roberts’ dissent “wrong to bewail a decision that will force judges, including members of his own court, to take apparent conflicts of interest more seriously.”); Edit, No Tolerance for Bias: Supreme Court Issues Sound Ruling That Instructs Judges to Remain Impartial, LAS VEGAS SUN, June 11, 2009, at 4 (“Justice Anthony Kennedy, writing for the majority, made common sense that the Court “was appropriately careful not to put all contributors to judicial campaigns in the same basket. The decision that judges should recuse themselves applies only to cases in which an interested party was a substantial campaign contributor.”). See also David Kihara, Court Rules on Elected Judges, L.A. REV.-J., June 9, 2009, at 9B (Underneath text stating “News Item: U.S. Supreme Court rules that elected judges must recuse themselves in cases where large campaign contributions might create the perception of bias” is picture of litigant attempting to enter courtroom but stopped at toll both by guard stating “Hey – it’s now the only way the judge can rake in a few campaign bucks”) (boldface in original). See also David Kihara, Court Rules on Elected Judges, L.A. REV.-J., June 9, 2009, at 1A (“Opinion: Recusal might be needed to avoid appearance of bias”) (italics in original) (also attributing to State Bar president that “it’s very common for parties to complain that a judge is biased, but it’s rarely true” and quoting law professor that lawyers will “push the envelope” with Caperton recusal claims). The Wall Street Journal editorial, in addition to sounding the trumpeting states’ rights federalism (“[r]ecusal standards are better handled at the state level, where individual judges are presumed to be impartial in their courtrooms. . . . Allowing federal courts to second-guess state judges opens the door to unprecedented federal meddling.”), followed the Roberts dissent script of raising concerns of unpredictability and arbitrariness in the application of Caperton-style recusal.

Heretofore, judges needed to recuse themselves on due process grounds only if they had a direct financial interest in a case, and in criminal contempt cases in which the judge provoked the original courtroom outburst. Under Justice Anthony Kennedy’s Caperton standard, judges must now recuse if there is a “probability of bias.” But this would seem to be open to, well, judicial interpretation.

* * * *

In his dissent, Chief Justice John Roberts lists 40 questions that represent only “a few uncertainties that quickly come to mine.” The majority opinion “requires state and federal judges simultaneously to act as political scientists (why did candidate X win the election?), economists (was the financial support disproportionate?) and psychologists (is there likely to be a debt of gratitude?)”

[The majority’s attempt] to limit any judicial chaos [by characterizing Caperton as a rare case is unpersuasive] . . . support for this position by such opponents of judicial elections as the Brennan Center for Justice and the George Soros-funded Justice at Stake gives away the game.

* * * *

The ultimate goal of these groups is to have all judges elected by a club of lawyers and insiders that makes judges less accountable to average citizens.
criticisms of Caperton fall roughly into three categories: (1) states’ rights federalism; (2) concerns about limits on free expression in elections; and (3) questions about practical problems with Caperton.

1. States’ Rights Federalism

The states’ rights critique argues that Caperton, by expanding federal constitutional scrutiny of state court proceedings via the Due Process Clause intrudes too greatly into a core state function of adjudication. Justice Scalia’s dissent states this most strongly but there are elements in the Roberts’ dissent as well. Justices Scalia and Thomas have been reasonably consistent on this point in that they also have steadily resisted the Court’s expanded review of state court punitive damages judgments for compliance with due process. In its simplest form, their view is that the Constitution should not be used as a roving license to correct state court error. While the occasional adjudication by judges who should have recused or the ridiculously large punitive damages award may be regrettable, these are seen by Justices Scalia and Thomas largely as mere error – and the U.S. Supreme Court’s role is not to correct error but to resolve questions of federal and constitutional law.

The Scalia-Thomas perspective has much to recommend it and may strike a particularly responsive chord with those who found the Court’s punitive damages precedents

See Judges and ‘Bias’, supra.

Responding to the Journal editorial lies beyond the scope of this article but the editorial demands at least a brief reply regarding its fallacious premise. According to the Journal, appointed judges are antidemocratic and deprive the “average citizen” of voice. But as reflected in the actual facts of Caperton (rather than the Journal’s imaginary view of the world), the mythical average citizen had far less to do with Justice Benjamin’s election than did $3 million contributor Don Blankenship. Fears of insider dominance in an appointed judiciary are of course legitimate. But could any insider’s club of the legal establishment be smaller than one wealthy corporate CEO? The Journal’s attack on Caperton, to use the Journal’s own words, “gives away the game.”

See also Editorial, Bias on the Bench: The Supreme Court Weighs In on the Corrosive Impact of Money in Judicial Elections, WASH. POST, July 10, 2009, available at www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2009/06/09/AR2009060902726 (taking a relatively moderate and balanced view that Caperton decision “raised more questions than it answered, but it should serve as a call to states to tighten judicial ethics standards and rethink judicial elections altogether.”): Dahlia Lithwick, The Great Caperton Caper, SLATE, June 8, 2009, http://www.slate.com/id/2220031 (noting apparent introspection of majority opinion and its retreat from traditional mythology that judging is a formal process detached from personal experiences and views, finding portion of the opinion “strikingly resonant with [Supreme Court nominee Judge Sonia] Sotomayor’s much-maligned Berkeley speech, about how the average judge goes about deciding a case, quoting majority opinion, see Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., 129 S. Ct. 2252, 2262-63, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *25-26 (2009) (which cited BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO, THE NATURE OF THE JUDICIAL PROCESS 9 (1921), and asking whether including “empathy” in factors relevant to judicial outcomes “can be far behind?”). See 129 S. Ct. at 2275-76, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *57-59 (“the principal consequence of today’s decision is to create vast uncertainty with respect to a point of law that can be raised in all litigated cases in (at least) those 39 states that elect their judge.”) (“The Court today continues its quixotic quest to right all wrongs and repair all imperfections through the Constitution.”)

See id. at 2267-68, *39-40 (Court’s new ‘rule’ provides no guidance to judges and litigants about when recusal will be constitutionally required.”).

See, e.g., BMW, 517 U.S. at 598 (Scalia, J. and Thomas, J., dissenting); State Farm, 538 U.S. at 429-30 (Scalia, J., Thomas, J., dissenting).
problematic. There are even some signs that the Court, which intervened to save large businesses from punitive damages awards it disliked, has been partially moved by their concerns. It recently declined to review an $80 million punitive damages award in a tobacco liability case after initially expressing interest. Roving Court intervention pursuant to the Due Process Clause could at worst become the substitution of the judgment of five justices for that of an entire state court system (jury, trial judge, appellate panel and state supreme court). Even if prudently invoked, due process review on what essentially are fairness grounds arguably misapplies scarce judicial resources.

But if the states’ rights critique of Caperton is correct, it argues for declining ever to overturn a state court decision on disqualification grounds. Once the Court majority has determined that due process concerns permit some policing of state outcomes involving improperly participating jurists, the Rubicon has been crossed. The Court will be intervening in some state proceeding where a judge has failed to recuse. Indeed, the Court has been engaged in some form of this enterprise since the 1927 Tumey decision and has steadily if infrequently intervened to vindicate fairness concerns for more than 80 years in cases like Ward v. Monroeville, and Aetna v. Lavoie, which arguably involved far less judicial self-interest and threat to public confidence than that faced by Justice Benjamin in Caperton.

The issue is not whether the Due Process Clause permits the policing of judicial impartiality. That question is now settled, by however slim a vote, in favor of giving the Court at least the power to intervene. Logically as well, the guarantee of due process, if it is to mean 104 See BMW, 517 U.S. 559 (vacating $4 million dollar punitive damages award against major automobile manufacturer for failing to disclose touch-up paint job on new car); Honda Motor Co., Ltd. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415 (1994) (overturning $5 million punitive damages award in product liability case); State Farm, 538 U.S. 408 (vacating $145 million punitive damages award against insurer in bad faith claim); Philip Morris USA v. Williams, 549 U.S. 346 (2007) (vacating $79.5 million punitive damages award in tobacco product liability and fraud claim); Exxon v. Baker, 128 S. Ct. 2605 (2009) (vacating $2.5 billion punitive damages award in oil spill case and in essence capping maximum award at $500 million).

---

105 Philip Morris, 549 U.S. 346. After the 2007 remand of this case, the Oregon Supreme Court reaffirmed its support for the jury’s $80 million punitive damages award, prompting the tobacco company to again seek U.S. Supreme Court review. After granting certiorari, the Court vacated and remanded for a decision to be made under the new standard declared in the case that a jury may not punish a defendant for harm done to non-parties.

106 See Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510 (1927) (finding due process violation where mayor presided over alcohol violations court where funds from fines he imposed funded the court and supplemented his salary).

107 See Ward v. Monroeville, 409 U.S. 57 (1972) (finding due process violation where mayor presided over court that imposed fines that became part of general town funds; mayor’s pecuniary interest in case outcomes was too great even though his salary was not directly increased or funded by fines collected).

108 See Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 475 U.S. 813 (1986) (due process violated where Alabama Supreme Court justice whose case deciding vote against insurer in bad faith case himself had pending bad faith action presenting similar issues in claim against different insurer; justice could create favorable precedent that would enhance his monetary claim in violation of constitutional fairness).

109 See also Gibson v. Berryhill, 411 U.S. 564 (1973) (administrative board of optometrists had sufficient financial interest in cases involving competing optometrists to violate due process in board’s adjudication of claims against competitors).
anything, must mean that citizens of the states will not be subject to “kangaroo courts” where judges are viewed as compromised or even corrupt because of the substantial campaign support they received from litigants or lawyers.\textsuperscript{110}

The relevant question that should concern the judiciary going forward is the standard that should be used in guiding the Court’s occasional interventions. \textit{Caperton}’s “probability of bias” standard, although a seemingly higher threshold than simple error in recusal, is sufficiently malleable that it provides relatively little protection to the states’ rights concerns of the dissenters. The Court nonetheless retains the power to upset a state court decision using a probability of bias standard just as it could vacate a state court decision using a reasonable question as to impartiality standard.

Further, because the probability of bias standard is apparently reserved only for due process disqualification matters rather than judicial recusal generally, it also creates the problem of applying a different standard, seldom deployed, while adoption of the more straight-forward error-in-recusal standard provides the court with a far larger body of precedent for determining the propriety of a judge’s refusal to recuse.

Adoption of the broader but more familiar “reasonable question as to impartiality” standard for assessing due process violations can provide greater consistency without leading to the flood of litigation feared by the \textit{Caperton} dissenters. As outlined at greater length below, the power to intervene in non-disqualification cases is, like all the Supreme Court’s power, almost entirely discretionary.\textsuperscript{111} In \textit{Caperton}, the majority tacitly used considerations for intervention suggested in the chief justices’ brief.\textsuperscript{112} If combined with the additional considerations set forth in this article,\textsuperscript{113} the Court would possess a template adequate for continuing to vindicate due process fairness where necessary without becoming a court of omnibus error correction in disqualification matters.

2.Limits on Free Expression

The free expression objection to \textit{Caperton} contends that the decision conflicts with Court precedent resisting certain types of electoral regulation due to First Amendment concerns. \textit{Caperton} is thus seen as in some tension with \textit{Buckley v. Valeo},\textsuperscript{114} \textit{Republican Party of Minnesota}

\begin{footnotes}
\footnote{See Jeffrey W. Stempel, \textit{Keeping Arbitrations From Becoming Kangaroo Courts}, 8 NEV. L.J. 251, 256 (2007) (setting forth definition of term kangaroo court and discussing its origin).}
\footnote{See ROBERT L. STEARN, ET AL., \textit{SUPREME COURT PRACTICE} 220-21 (8th ed. 2002) (the Judiciary Act of 1925 gave the Supreme Court “firm control over the main body of its work”).}
\footnote{See Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., 129 S. Ct. 2252, 2263-64, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *28-29 (2009). (utilizing chief justices amicus brief consideration such as relative size of campaign contribution, magnitude of election spending, and impact of contribution to determine whether campaign support was sufficient to raise due process concerns).}
\footnote{See infra Part III.E.2 (listing additional considerations for determining when Court should review cases in which erroneous failure to recuse occurred).}
\footnote{See Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976) (striking down certain limits on campaign contributions and activity as violating the First Amendment).}
\end{footnotes}
which all struck down at least a portion of efforts to restrict campaign activity on constitutional grounds, and and New York State Board of Elections v. Lopez Torres, which upheld the state procedures under challenged but reiterated the concerns expressed in Buckley v. Valeo and White. These cases can be read standing for the proposition that the constitutional right of free speech in the political arena makes all but the most narrowly tailored restrictions on campaign activity impermissible. In particular, because Buckley v. Valeo found campaign contributions to be a form of protected speech, it would seem to support Massey’s argument that it should not be penalized (by having a favorable decision vacated) merely because it expressed its support for one of the jurists through campaign contributions.

The persuasiveness of the free expression critique of Caperton lies in the eye of the beholder. To those favoring wide open campaigning and tending to dislike any regulation of the process, Caperton is indeed in some tension with prior caselaw. However, unlike New York Times v. Sullivan, which provided a zone of liability protection for the news media, the “electoral freedom” First Amendment cases are regarded as problematic by many observers. Many have long harbored concerns that Buckley v. Valeo was wrongly decided and helped foster significant electoral pathology, including special interest group domination of American politics by monied interests. Republican Party v. White, like Caperton, was a 5-4 decision that many view as having accelerated the trend to judicial elections that look more like All the King’s Men or American Idol and less like reflective selection of serious jurists. At a minimum,

\[\text{\textsuperscript{115} See Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765 (2002) (striking down Minnesota judicial code’s “announce” clause, prohibiting candidate from stating position on legal issues and past court decisions as violating of First Amendment).}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{116} See N.Y. State Bd. of Elections v. Lopez Torres, 552 U.S. 196 (2008).}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{117} See N.Y. Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964) (holding that First Amendment set constitutional limits on prosecution of defamation matters, including requirement that if defamation plaintiff is a public figure such as a politician, recovery can be had only if media defendant knew published statement defaming plaintiff was false or acted with “reckless disregard” of its truth or falsity).}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{119} See ROBERT PENN WARREN, ALL THE KING’S MEN (1946) (describing rough-and-tumble world of electoral politics in novel presenting main character similar to Louisiana governor Huey P. Long). See also EDWIN O’CONNOR, THE LAST HURRAH (1956) (a thinly veiled portrayal of Boston Mayor James Michael Curley).}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{120} See, e.g., Jessica Gall, Living with Republican Party of Minnesota v. White: The Birth and Death of Judicial Campaign Speech Restrictions, 13 COMM. L. & POL’Y REV. 97 (2008); Leita Walker, Protecting Judges from White’s Aftermath: How the Public-Employee Speech Doctrine Might Help Judges and the Courts in Which They Work, 20 GEO. J. LEGAL ETHICS 371 (2007). The dissents in White, of course, also take this view. See 536 U.S. at 797, 803 (Stevens, J., joined by Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer, J.J., dissenting) (“disposition of this case on the flawed premise that the criteria for the election to judicial office should mirror the rules applicable to political elections is profoundly misguided”), and at 803, 821 (Ginsburg, J., joined by Stevens, Souter, and Breyer, J.J., dissenting) (“For more than three-quarters of a century, States like Minnesota have endeavored, through experiment tested by experience, to balance the constitutional interest in judicial integrity and free expression within the unique setting of an elected judiciary. . . [Reasonable restrictions on judicial candidate speech] are an essential component in Minnesota’s accommodation of the complex and competing concerns in this sensitive area.

}
one can answer the free expression critique of Caperton by invoking the Due Process Clause, which has at least as much historical pedigree and power as the First Amendment.

But, like the states’ rights concern about Caperton, the free expression issue affects only the question of whether the Supreme Court should even become involved with review of disqualification matters. Once the Court does so (as it has for 80 years or so), some sort of standard for intervention is required. Requiring something more than mere error below arguably reduces such intervention and correspondingly reduces the posited free expression or states’ rights “harm.” But there is no way of knowing whether a “probability of bias” standard will result in significantly fewer interventions than a “reasonable question as to impartiality” standard. Certainly, a reasonable reader of U.S. Supreme Court decisions can be forgiven for being unsure of whether Caperton’s probability of bias standard is in practice much different from a simple rule that improper failure to recuse violates due process – at least if the Court finds the failure sufficiently egregious.\(^121\)

In the end, it will still be the Court’s case-specific exercise of discretion that determines whether cases like Caperton are rare or relatively common on the Court’s docket. Weighed against any possible reduction in federal intrusion that would presumably please the Caperton dissenters are the questions of application surrounding the probability of bias standard, which also troubled the dissenters. If the Court is to be in the due process disqualification “business” in any event, employment of a yardstick for review that comports with the general recusal standard promises the prospect of more consistent application, perhaps with no greater frequency of Court intervention.

3. Practical Problems of Implementation

\(^{121}\) See, e.g., Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765, 775-776 (2002) (state defending limitations on judicial candidate speech and its supporters argue to the Court “that an impartial judge is essential for due process.”). Justice Scalia, author of White, then summarizes the precedents invoked as follows.

Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510, 523, 531-34 (1927) (judge violated due process by sitting in a case in which it would be in his financial interest to find against one of the parties); Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 475 U.S. 813, 822-825 (same); Ward v. Monroeville, 409 U.S. 57 (same); Johnson v. Mississippi, 403 U.S. 212, 215-216 (1971) (judge violated due process by sitting in a case in which one of the parties was a previously successful litigant against him; Bracey v. Gramley, 520 U.S. 899, 905 (1997) (would violate due process if a judge was disposed to rule against defendants who did not bribe him in order to cover up the fact that he regularly ruled in favor of defendants who did not bribe him); In re Murchison, 349 U.S. 133, 137-139 (1955) (judge violated due process by sitting in the criminal trial of defendant who he had indicted).

See 536 U.S. at 776 (parallel citations and italicized case names removed).

Reviewing this summary of the established pre-Caperton case law concerning recusal required on due process grounds, one is struck by the difficulty in determining whether the Court has historically imposed due process recusal because the judge’s impartiality was subject to question or whether it was requiring that, beyond this, the reasonable lay viewer must also think that the judge is “probably” biased or prejudiced. If the Caperton dissenters (such as Justice Scalia) are correct that the due process recusal standard lacks sufficient clarity, this appears to be a problem that predates Caperton. 27
The practical problems critique of Caperton, which is the focus of the Roberts dissent, argues more directly that expanded due process review of disqualification decisions will substantially increase the workload of the Supreme Court and other courts, in large part because of the alleged difficulty of determining when a probability of bias exists. To a degree, the practical problems criticism of Caperton is an argument that the Court should not police state court disqualification failures at all. Like the free expression and states’ rights criticisms of Caperton, this part of the practical problems critique is not relevant to the question of what test should be used in determining when non-disqualification violates due process. Hard core critics of Caperton do not want the Court in the recusal review business at all, save perhaps only in cases of very direct personal financial interest and matters in which the judge was also effectively the accuser of a litigant.

But, as with the other critiques of Caperton, the hard core practicality critique appears to be fighting a rear-guard action. Although pre-Caperton cases had not dealt specifically with campaign support in judicial elections and arguably only involved direct financial stakes, cases like Aetna v. Lavoie and Gibson v. Berryhill, if read realistically, show that the Court has for decades been willing to set aside cases involving compromised jurists even if the judge’s interest in a matter was attenuated and did not directly implicate payment of funds to the judge. Once the Tumey Court correctly found that doubts about a judge’s neutrality implicated the Due Process Clause, there was logically no turning back and the Court has correspondingly refused to turn back (although it’s frequent 5-4 decisions on matters of judicial ethics do not place this beyond the realm of possibility).

For purposes of this article, the relevant question regarding the practical problems attack on Caperton, like the states’ rights and free expression attack, is the content of the standard for determining when judicial non-disqualification violates due process. Of all the criticisms of Caperton, the practical problems attack is most easily accommodated to this article’s suggestion that it be considered a due process problem whenever a state jurist erroneously fails to recuse. The potentially broader scope of this standard (as compared to Caperton’s probability of bias standard), may lead to more litigation, but the litigation can be more easily resolved because the standard is clearer, easier to apply, informed by more precedent and experience, and – like the probability of bias standard – still requires the support of at least four justices before it can become a basis for overturning a state court judgment.

Consequently, whatever the merits of the arguments of Caperton critics on the “should the Court be doing this at all?” question, there is no reason not to use the most efficacious test for

---

122 See supra Part II.B, discussing Roberts dissent.
123 See Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 475 U.S. 813 (1986) (state court justice’s participation in case violated due process not because he was or would be directly compensated by either litigant but because his decision could result in court precedent favorable to him in a pending insurance coverage and bad faith case presenting similar issues).
124 See Gibson v. Berryhill, 411 U.S. 564 (1973) (due process was violated where administrative board of optometrists conducted regulatory/disciplinary hearing involving competing optometrists).
125 See Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510 (1927), discussed supra at text accompanying notes 55-56.
126 In addition to Caperton, other 5-4 decisions concerning judicial ethics include Republican Party v. White, 536 U.S. 765 (2002), Liljeberg v. Health Services Acquisition Corp., 486 U.S. 847 (1988); Liteky v. United States, 510 U.S. 540 (1994) (although there was no dissent, five justices were in the majority and four joined the concurring opinion).
policing state court non-disqualification once the Court has entered the thicket in the first place. At least until the working five-justice majority of Caperton shifts or the Court abandons due process disqualification review in general, it should use the better standard of reasonable question as to a state court jurist’s impartiality.

D. The Correctness of the Caperton Holding and the Legitimacy of Concerns About It

Notwithstanding the criticisms, Caperton was clearly correctly decided on the merits of the case itself. Although, as J. Paul Getty famously remarked, “a billion dollars isn’t what it used to be,”127 three million dollars (the amount West Virginia Justice Brent Benjamin received from Massey CEO Don Blankenship) remains a lot of money, particularly to a lawyer seeking election to statewide judicial office.128 Fifty million dollars, the amount at stake in Massey’s case, is even more money. Allowing Justice Benjamin to sit in judgment on Massey’s appeal and to cast the deciding vote in favor of Massey looks too much like a bribe to be countenanced by a system that aspires to judicial impartiality. Even non-alarmist laypersons (who do not see every campaign contribution as a quid-for-future quo) would reasonably be alarmed to see such large sums directed by an interested litigant to a single judge pivotal to the resolution of the litigant’s large case. As well-put in a leading magazine, Justice Benjamin “found he was unbiased after deliberating within himself” and “[w]hat happened in West Virginia would have been unthinkable in most other countries.”129

Lawyers, even if more jaded about the world of judicial politics, might have additional reason to question the neutrality of Justice Benjamin (and the West Virginia Court 3-2 majority in the case). The majority’s legal grounds for granting victory to Massey rested on what many, if not most, observers would deem a strained view of both res judicata and enforcement of arbitration clauses.130 Although the majority’s legal rationale for saving Massey from a multi-million dollar adverse judgment may not have been completely laughable, neither was it clearly correct nor even within the mainstream of preclusion law or arbitration law.131 Further, even the West Virginia Justices supporting Massey conceded that the trial record reflected predatory conduct by Massey.132 In other words, Massey’s victory was based on what a layperson might... label a “technicality” unrelated to the merits. Observers, both legal and lay, could thus reasonably wonder whether Massey’s West Virginia victory was the product of showering so much cash upon Justice Benjamin.

But just as hard cases can make bad law, easy cases can arguably do the same, a point stressed by the dissenters\textsuperscript{133} and their allies in the media and the public.\textsuperscript{134} Even if one concedes that the facts of \textit{Caperton} are sufficiently outrageous to cry out for intervention by the Court, one can credibly argue that the cure of the Court’s intervention could be worse overall than the disease of perceived judicial bias. Put another way: just because Justice Benjamin made a bad mistake does not necessarily mean that the system as a whole is awash in such ethical lapses. Permitting the Court to episodically intervene on due process grounds may thus at a minimum be administrative overkill, leading to unwarranted logistical burdens on the system (e.g., de rigour claims of failure to recuse, weak certiorari petitions, increased cost and delay). Beyond this, the “I know it when I see it” quality of the \textit{Caperton} test for due process recusal may encourage unwise substantive second-guessing by the Court merely because the challenged decision reached a result disfavored by five members of the court (or at least review if four members of the Court held such concerns).

This case is before the Court on rehearing granted after the five elected Justices on the Court, while disagreeing about the proper ultimate outcome of the case, unanimously agreed that defendants “\textit{Massey’s conduct warranted the type of judgment rendered \{below\} in this case.}” \textit{Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc.}, 2007 W. Va. LEXIS 119, 2007 WL 415960, Slip Op. at 13 (No. 33350, filed November 21, 2007), withdrawn.

* * * *

Today’s “new” opinion of the Court rests on the same indefensible legal grounds [regarding forum selection and res judicata] as the original opinion – supplemented by even more extended discussion of some of the points – but, strangely, omitting the clearly correct assertion in the original majority opinion that “\textit{Massey’s conduct warranted the type of judgment rendered \{below\} in this case.}” \textit{Id.} This time the majority stands silent regarding any disdain of Massey’s conduct. Once again it bends the law to deny Plaintiffs the proper “\textit{result that clearly appears to be justified.}” \textit{Id.}

For the record, we wholeheartedly embrace the determination of this Court in the original, now withdrawn, opinion that “\textit{Massey’s conduct warranted the type of judgment rendered \{below\} in this case.}” \textit{Id.} Likewise, we do not shrink from saying without reservation that this Court should now affirm the judgment against the Massey Defendants for the reasons outlined in this dissent. Moreover, the failure of the Court now to even acknowledge the justice of Plaintiffs’ case below, as it had in the previous opinion, underlines the result-driven nature of the current majority opinion. \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{133} As the Roberts dissent stated:

\begin{quote}
Extreme cases often test the bounds of established legal principles. There is a cost to yielding to the desire to correct the extreme case, rather than adhering to the legal principle. That cost has been demonstrated so often that it is captured in a legal aphorism: “Hard cases make bad law.”
\end{quote}

\textsuperscript{134} \textit{See, e.g., Joshua Mayes, Elected Judges Under Fire: New Supreme Court Case Expands Grounds for Judicial Recusal, MONDAQ, July 20, 2009.}
Although these criticisms of Caperton are justified, they are also overwrought. Although the Roberts dissent lists some 40 questions largely attacking the practicality of the Caperton test (80 questions if one counts subparts), this exercise in Monday morning quarterbacking largely submits to reasonable answers. While the Caperton approach cannot be reduced to a robotic formula, most fair readers of the opinion understand what it means. Henceforth, a state judge or justice should be reluctant to sit on any case involving the litigant or a closely interested party where that person or entity has been a major campaign supporter of the jurist in question – or at least more reluctant than before Caperton.

Consequently, much of the criticism of Caperton based on practical application and consistency should be viewed as insufficient to undermine the decision, and certainly insufficient to suggest that it should have come out the other way. But it nonetheless should be acknowledged that Caperton’s standard for invoking the Due Process Clause could be clearer. By adopting a new test for due process disqualification, Caperton probably will spur more disqualification litigation, some of it strategic rather than valid. But the response to these fears should not be retreat from the goal of judicial neutrality. More constructively, the Court can clarify Caperton’s application through a few well-chosen decisions providing guidance on due process-based constitutionally required recusal as well as consistently and quickly denying certiorari petitions based on strained recusal arguments.

III. Making Caperton Better Through Clarity and Expansion Rather than Retrenchment

A. The Value of Harmonizing Constitution-Based Disqualification and Recusal Based on Rule or Statute

Rather than being criticized as too great a federal constitutional intervention in the state judiciary, observers should recognize that Caperton’s tentative and case-specific approach did not go far enough and failed to enunciate the type of more sweeping due process recusal standard necessary to restore and maintain confidence in state judiciaries. The past 20 years have witnessed a disturbing increase in expensive, highly electioneered state judicial races in which under-informed voters in low-turnout contests are subjected to misleading campaign advertisements largely financed by interest groups. Money has begun to talk in a disturbing dialect in state judicial elections.

---

136 See Not for Sale, supra note 129 (Caperton, whatever its ambiguity, will make judges more reluctant to sit on cases affecting large campaign contributors); Caperton Ruling May Spur States, supra note 77 (same); Amanda Bronstad, Stage Set for Litigation Over Judicial Recusal, NAT’L J., June 22, 2009, p. 1 (same, but emphasizing uncertainty of decision, tension with Court’s First Amendment precedent, and likelihood of additional litigation to test the limits of Caperton).

137 See Not for Sale, supra note 77 (“Between 2000 and 2007 state Supreme Court contests raised $168m, more than twice the amount raised in the 1990s.”); Kavan Peterson, Costs of Judicial Races Stirs Reformers; State Supreme Court Elections Increasingly are Battlegrounds for Groups Seeking to Install Judges Who Lean Their Way on Major Legal Issues. Some States are Considering Changes to Address What They See as Threats to the Impartiality and Fairness of Their Courts, STATLINE.ORG, Aug. 5, 2005 (West Virginia “is considering scrapping judicial elections
What is needed is not a cautious or reluctant Caperton doctrine but one that matches well with sound prevailing attitudes on judicial recusal as expressed in the 2007 ABA Code of Judicial Conduct. Due process-based recusal should not only be available when there is an objective probability of bias in a judge, but should be available whenever the judge’s impartiality may be reasonably questioned, in particular whenever the challenged judge has received inordinate campaign support from a litigant, lawyer, or entity highly interested in the outcome of a pending case.

The standards of Rule 2.11 of the Model Judicial Code and federal disqualification law set forth in 28 U.S.C. §455(a) should be harmonized with the Constitution’s mandate that state action (and adjudication is of course state action) accord disputants due process of the law. The solution to the Caperton dissenters’ operational concerns lies in recognizing that all recusal errors violate due process and that all such mistakes by the state bench are at least potentially subject to reversal by the U.S. Supreme Court on due process grounds.

At first glance, this proposition may seem excessive. The Caperton majority took pains to state that it regarded the Due Process Clause as having less expansive reach than federal and state law regarding judicial disqualification. As outlined by the majority, Congress and the states are free to require recusal even where failure to require disqualification would not rise to the level of a due process violation. To illustrate, 28 U.S.C. §455(a) and Rule 2.11 of the Model Judicial Code both require a judge to step aside if his or her impartiality “might be reasonably questioned.” However, under Caperton, a judge’s failure to properly apply this standard does not rise to the level of a due process violation unless there is not only reasonable question as to the judge’s impartiality but also a probability that the nonrecusing judge is also in fact biased or prejudiced.

The Caperton standard is thus too skittish about interfering in state judicial miscarriages of justice because it fails to acknowledge an essential truth: when a party’s claim is heard by a judge who improperly failed to recuse, that party has been denied due process even if the erring judge’s participation does not create the probability of bias. It is enough that the erring judge’s impartiality was subject to reasonable question and yet the judge continued to participate in the case. Now that the “no reasonable question regarding impartiality” standard has governed disqualification for more than 35 years, the Caperton majority is incorrect to suggest that failure to meet this standard could somehow satisfy due process. To talk of a lower bar set by the Constitution as compared to essentially uniform national law (via state adoption of the ABA Model Code) seems inapt and incorrect when the question is about judicial neutrality rather than amount of public benefits or length of a limitations period.

The U.S. Supreme Court’s due process jurisprudence, although nuanced and reasonably complex, essentially devolves to the position that in order to satisfy due process, a litigant’s claim or defense must be adjudicated by a neutral decision-maker following uniform procedure evenhandedly applied to the litigants. The modern concept of a neutral decision-maker is one whose impartiality is not subject to reasonable question. Where the judge’s impartiality is subject to reasonable question, Section §455(a) and Rule 2.11 have been violated. When this occurs, the proceeding is by definition one lacking a neutral decision-maker and the litigant has been denied a basic pillar of due process.

In any case involving a judge lacking neutrality, as defined by the modern norm, due process is absent. Although the precise contours between procedural due process and substantive due process are often blurred, it seems inarguable that adjudication by a judge that erred in failing to disqualify violates procedural due process in that the aggrieved litigant failed to receive the type of neutral tribunal guaranteed by the Constitution. A logical extension of this assessment therefore recognizes that there is a due process violation every time a disqualified judge nonetheless presides in a case.

B. Fear Not the Floodgates

Whether the Supreme Court wishes to intervene in every such case is yet another question. As a practical matter, there will always be strong de facto limits on Caperton-style review of judicial recusal decisions. The Court decides fewer than 100 cases a year and has nearly complete control over its docket. Only if four justices find nonrecusal sufficiently outrageous will the Court grant certiorari and review the matter. As the Caperton dissents reveal, four current justices would prefer that the Court never review such cases. Realistically, the Court will in the foreseeable future review only very suspicious, seemingly outrageous failures to recuse. Fairly debatable decisions declining disqualification are effectively immune from U.S. Supreme Court review.

Although this may disappoint those who see the system as too lax regarding recusal, it is almost a complete refutation of the dissenters’ lament that Caperton will usher in a flood of cert petitions alleging failure to recuse sufficient to violate due process. Although there will indeed probably be an uptick in the number of such certiorari arguments, this creates at most simply somewhat greater logistical burden on the Court, which is a small price to pay for making the Court and the Constitution available as needed for policing judicial impartiality in important or outrageous cases. Further, because the Court already has moved away from individual Justice assessment of certiorari petitions through use of a “cert pool” in which all Justices but Justice Stevens participate, the additional screening work per justice or per chamber would seem minimal.

Consequently, moving from a “probability of bias or prejudice” test for due process disqualification to a test asking whether the court erroneously applied applicable federal or state disqualification law is unlikely to unleash any greater number of recusal-based requests for certiorari because the Caperton test is not all that different from the “erroneous failure to recuse” test I advocate. To the extent there is no great difference in court workload under either standard, adoption of this article’s suggested broader test can bring the benefits of consistency (the general recusal standard and the due process recusal standard would be the same) and greater predictability (there are many general recusal cases by which litigation outcomes can be predicted but comparatively few due process disqualification cases, making predictability problematic under that standard). Most important, however, shifting from the Caperton probability of bias standard to the error-in-recusal standard would signal greater systemic commitment to judicial neutrality. Even if, as a practical matter, only the most egregious failures to recuse will be heard by the high court, the possibility sets a standard requiring greater care throughout the judicial system.

If the legal system wants to give more than lip service to the idea of judicial neutrality, it should acknowledge that every erroneous recusal decision denies due process. A due process violation occurs when the judge presides over a case under circumstances where his/her impartiality is subject to reasonable question. The additional Caperton requirement of the “probability” of actual bias is unnecessary.

C. Procedural and Substantive Due Process Regarding Disqualification

Adjudication involving a judge who should have been disqualified from presiding violates both procedural and substantive due process. At a minimum, a disputant appearing before a disqualified judge has not had fair process. These circumstances also violate substantive due process in that a litigant not only has the procedural right to a neutral forum but also that judicial neutrality is itself a substantive right of which litigants should not be divested.

I realize this is perhaps a radical assertion, one that if accepted poses some danger of expansive substantive due process review that might actually lead to some of the negative implications outlined in the Roberts and Scalia dissents to the Caperton holding. However, unless the Court is willing to repudiate its punitive damages precedents, my logic seems unassailable. The Court has now repeatedly stated that substantive due process permits the Court to overturn punitive damage awards that are the product of full and procedurally fair adjudication under applicable state law. The Court has not been this blunt about the substantive due process basis for its punitive damages policing and one can argue that the punitive damages awards suffered from procedural irregularities sufficient to justify the Court’s intervention. Fairly read, however, the Court’s punitive damage due process cases appear to stand for the proposition that if a state court litigation outcome violates due process if the end result is sufficiently unfair. This is a substantive due process argument (and pretty clear judicial activism), no matter how reluctant the Justices may be to admit it.

---

Procedural due process is fairness in the process by which a case is adjudicated. If a statute or rule is under procedural due process review, the question is whether the law does not provide adequately fair process to a litigant. Substantive Due process means that the case outcome or legal regime affecting a litigant was, as the name implies, substantively fair.

144 See supra Part II.B, discussing concerns raised in Roberts and Scalia dissents.
145 See supra note 101 and accompanying text, discussing Supreme Court use of Due Process Clause to vacate state court punitive damages awards.
146 See BMW of N. Am. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 598-99 (1996) (Scalia, J. and Thomas, J., dissenting) (dissenters “do not regard the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause as a secret repository of substantive guarantees against ‘unfairness’-neither the unfairness of an excessive civil compensatory award, nor the unfairness of an “unreasonable” punitive award. What the Fourteenth Amendment's procedural guarantee assures is an opportunity to contest the reasonableness of a damages judgment in state court); State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 416 (2003) (majority only mentions that there are “procedural and substantive constitutional limitations” on punitive damages awards states can give).
147 For example, in the 2003 State Farm v. Campbell decision, discussed notes 103 and 104, supra, the Court vacated the $145 million punitive award against the insurer in part because the state courts had permitted plaintiffs to introduce evidence of defendant wrongdoing in other states involving other types of insurance policies. See 538 U.S. at 414. This troubling assessment restricting the scope of judicial inquiry into defendant wrongdoing is arguably a procedural due process analysis and arguably could have been enough to support the Court’s eradication of the punitive award. However, the Campbell opinion centers on setting forth a substantive template for due process review of punitive damages awards, most infamously the Court’s admonishment that punitive assessments exceeding nine times the compensatory award were usually constitutionally infirm. See id. at 425. See also STEMPPEL, LITIGATION ROAD, supra note 103, at Ch. 22 (summarizing and criticizing Court’s analysis of procedural and substantive issues). As a whole, Campbell thus seems clearly to be a substantive due process opinion.

Other Supreme Court opinions striking down punitive damages on due process grounds also often have some procedural aspect as well. For example, the 2007 Philip Morris v. Williams decision (549 U.S. 346 (2007), discussed supra note 105) directed substantial focus to the jury instructions used in the case. But Williams also contained substantial discussion of substantive due process limitations on the size of punitive damages awards. BMW (517 U.S. 559 (1996), discussed supra at note 104), the case that started the Court down the road of punitive damages review, appears not to have been based on any procedural deficiencies below but only on the Court’s perceived unfairness of awarding a doctor $4 million because the paint on his BMW had been retouched.
Advocates of limited federal constitutional intrusion into state matters may resist any sort of procedural due process review but are generally more concerned about case-specific review as this puts the Supreme Court in the position of acting as another layer of appeal over state courts while due process review of the face of a statute is a more generalized, arguably less intrusive form of due process scrutiny. Generally, advocates of constitutional restraint are more troubled by the use of substantive due process than of procedural due process. The latter inquiry is less intrusive in that it only insists that states operate a fair system, without becoming involved in the outcomes that emerge from that procedurally fair system. By contrast, a substantive due process inquiry asks not only whether a litigant received a fair process but also evaluates the case result and sets it aside if deemed sufficiently substantively unfair.

Substantive due process review of state law received a particularly bad name because of its use in the late Nineteenth and early Twentieth Century to strike down progressive social legislation on the ground that this violated the substantive constitutional rights of the regulated, including the “right” of workers to toil for endless hours under unsafe conditions for low pay. The apogee of this use of substantive due process is generally seen as Lochner v. New York, a case in which the Court used substantive due process to strike down a labor law modestly protective of workers. Within a few years, the Court was moving away from this perspective, arguably rejecting it altogether by the New Deal era. However, more recent case law is often characterized as sounding uncomfortably in notions of substantive due process. For example, Roe v. Wade, which struck down state abortion regulation, is often characterized as a problematic substantive due process decision of the left akin to Lochner’s use of substantive due process.

---

151 See NOWAK & ROTUNDA, supra note 89, at §10.6.

153 See Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905) (see description infra note 154); Adair v. United States, 208 U.S. 161 (1908) (held unconstitutional a federal law prohibiting railroad employees from becoming union members); Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U.S. 1 (1915) (same); New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U.S. 262 (1932) (struck down a law requiring an ice company to produce a certificate of convenience and necessity as a prerequisite to entry into business).

154 198 U.S. 45 (1905) (holding that the state abused its police power when it enacted a law limiting the number of hours a bakery employee could work a week. The Court stated this violated due process rights by depriving citizens of the liberty to contract with employers for their livelihood).

Despite controversy over its use and a certain who’s-ox-is-getting-gored quality to debate over its use, judicial review on substantive due process grounds remains part of the constitutional fabric. But it is almost uniformly regarded as more problematic than judicial review based on only procedural due process grounds.\footnote{See John F. Basiak, Jr., The Roberts Court and the Future of Substantive Due Process: The Demise of “Split-the Difference” Jurisprudence?, 28 WHITTIER L. REV. 861 (2007) (arguing against substantive due process as judicial overreaching and lacking historical foundation); Benjamin C. Zipursky, A Theory of Punitive Damages, 84 TEX. L. REV. 105, 121 (2005) (stating that the Supreme Court’s use of substantive due process to overrule punitive damages awards “appears to be textually untethered”); ELY, DISTRUST, supra note 157, at 18 (referring to substantive due process as a “contradiction in terms”).} The prevailing sentiment in the legal community is that judicial intervention to ensure fair procedure is necessary for a functional legal system but that beyond this, the U.S. Supreme Court should be reluctant to second-guess the substantive outcomes that emerge from a procedurally adequate state legal system.\footnote{See Nowak & Rotunda, supra note 89, at §10.6; See Zipursky, supra note 160; Peter J. Rubin, Square Pegs and Round Holes: Substantive Due Process, Procedural Due Process, and the Bill of Rights, 103 COLUM. L. REV. 833, 833-34 (2003) (noting that even the Supreme Court does not seem completely comfortable with the notion of substantive due process).}

The aversion to constitutional supervision of particular state court outcomes is part of the Roberts dissent\footnote{See supra text accompanying notes 85-91, summarizing Roberts dissent.} in \textit{Caperton} and forms the focus of the Scalia dissent.\footnote{See supra text accompanying notes 92-96, summarizing Scalia dissent.} The vehemence of the Scalia dissent in particular suggests that he saw the \textit{Caperton} majority as engaging in substantive due process review. One reasonable response to this concern is a judicial preference for making procedural due process the primary focus of review of disqualification decisions, using substantive due process only in extreme cases (such as \textit{Caperton}). Better yet, as described below, \textit{Caperton} could have been decided solely on procedural due process grounds in that the challenged jurist had unfettered, absolute, and final authority to evaluate his own impartiality,\footnote{See Part I.B-C, discussing case history and Justice Benjamin’s sole authority over the issue of his participation in the case.} a judge-as-king system that violates procedural due process.

\begin{itemize}
\item \textbf{1. Primarily a Problem of Procedure}
\end{itemize}
Characterizing the right to a neutral magistrate as primarily one of procedural due process provides a means of placing de jure limits on Caperton-style review by the U.S. Supreme Court. If the right to a neutral judge is one of procedural due process, the constitutional requirement would seem to be satisfied whenever disqualification decision in question is subject to sufficiently disinterested review. To the extent states provide this, they would effectively insulate their disqualification decisions from review on procedural due process grounds.

Consider, for example, the typical disqualification case in which a litigant challenges a trial judge’s impartiality. Although the trial judge himself makes the initial decision as to whether he will sit, that decision is subject to review through appeal, usually to both an intermediate appellate court and the state supreme court. Although appellate review of the trial judge’s decision normally must await final resolution of the case at the trial court level, an aggrieved litigant may also make an interlocutory challenge to the non-recusing judge through a writ of mandamus or prohibition.

Increasingly, states also provide that the trial judge’s decision refusing recusal will be examined by the chief judge of the district or by another disinterested judge in the district. Thus, trial court recusal decisions, although heavily influenced by the target judge’s own views as to his or her impartiality, are not in final instance decided by the judge whose neutrality is at issue. It would thus seem that the litigant always receives procedural due process in such cases, even if the reviewing tribunal perpetuates a target judge’s error in failing to order recusal. However, if the right to a neutral adjudicator is one of substantive due process, one can argue that even after layers of review, it is possible that the participation of a tainted judge violates the Due Process Clause.

At the intermediate appellate level a similar situation obtains. In most states, it appears that a challenge to an appellate judge’s impartiality is first decided by the challenged judge but that the decision is then reviewed by at least another judge or panel of the court if not the full court. Beyond this, any state Supreme Court review of the case will necessarily include review of the disqualification determination if it reviews the case at all. Because the 165 See FLAMM, supra note 7, Ch. 28, providing state-by-state summary of disqualification for cause); Stempel, REHNQUIST, RECUSAL AND REFORM, supra note 59, at 645-46 (discussing disqualification procedure as applied to trial judges and finding it acceptable).

166 See FLAMM, supra note 7, Chs. 28 (review of state substantive recusal law), 32 (discussion of appellate remedies, including extraordinary writs such as mandamus); ROGER S. HAYDOCK, DAVID F. HERR & JEFFREY W. STEMPPEL, FUNDAMENTALS OF PRETRIAL LITIGATION §11.5.2 (7th ed. 2008); Stempel, REHNQUIST, RECUSAL AND REFORM, supra note 59, at 632-43.
167 See Deborah Goldberg, James Sample & David E. Pozen, The Best Defense: Why Elected Courts Should Lead Recusal Reform, 46 WASHBURN L.J. 503, 516-25 (2007). This is, for example, the procedure in Nevada’s Eighth Judicial District, a 25-judge general jurisdiction court sitting in Las Vegas and encompassing Clark County, which has a population of roughly two million persons.
168 See FLAMM, supra note 7, Ch. 28; Goldberg, et al., supra note 157, at 516-25.
169 See, e.g., In re Blakem 912 So. 2d 907, 917-18 (Miss. 2005) (holding that a trial judge was so obviously biased against an attorney that she must disqualify herself from all seven cases on her docket involving the attorney; Gillum v. United States, 613 A.2d 366, 369-70 (D.C. 1992) (per curiam) (requiring recusal of judge after a “heated” exchange between the judge and counsel during the trial); Commonwealth v. Stevenson, 393 A.2d 386, 394 (Pa. 1978) (finding that where record reveals ongoing bitter controversy between judge and defendant, recusal required in summary contempt proceedings); In re Anderson, 814 P.2d 773, 776 (Ariz. 1992) (finding that judge should not preside over cases involving a hospital because judge sat on hospital’s board).
challenged appellate judge does not have the final say concerning participation in the case, it would appear that procedural due process has been satisfied, even in cases where the challenged judge and the initially reviewing court have erred.

At the state supreme court level, recusal practice is more problematic. Many courts, perhaps a majority, appear to follow the U.S. Supreme Court’s defective model of allowing the challenged judge to be the first and last word on impartiality.170 Motions to recuse in such states are, as with the U.S. Supreme Court, addressed to the individual challenged justice, with no right to demand review before the entire court or even another justice or panel of the court. In these situations, it would seem that the litigant moving for disqualification is always denied procedural due process due to error in recusal because the final determination is not made by a neutral magistrate, panel, or entity.

The problem is well-illustrated in Caperton v. Massey itself. As the Massey challenge to Caperton’s $50 million lower court award made its way to the state supreme court, Caperton made at least three requests for recusal to Justice Benjamin.171 All were denied – by Justice Benjamin himself -- who also wrote at length to defend his nonrecusal,172 a response that tended to give credence to the challenge as Justice Benjamin “protested too much” and seemed excessively eager to continue to participate in an important case affecting his largest campaign benefactor.

Given the history of the Caperton v. Massey litigation and the judicial politics of West Virginia, one can never be sure, but it seems a safe bet that Justice Benjamin would have been off the case had the full state supreme court (minus Justice Benjamin, of course) been permitted to rule on the question of the Benjamin disqualification. Even if the four other members of the West Virginia court had erred and denied the recusal motion, one can make a strong case that Caperton would have then at least received adequate procedural due process. His motion to recuse would have been evaluated by a group of four “neutral” state supreme court justices. Moral of the story: state supreme courts can largely eliminate the threat of Caperton-style U.S. Supreme Court interference in state court proceedings by simply providing a reasonably fair mechanism for deciding recusal motions, one in which the target justice is excluded from being a “judge in his own [disqualification] case.”

2. The Practical Problems of a Purely Procedural Approach

Although it is clearly better to have the full state supreme court decide a recusal question than to leave it exclusively in the hands of the challenged justice, one can make a convincing argument that the full court is not a completely disinterested body unaffected by bias or prejudice. One powerful influence on any state supreme court is collegiality. The justices are disinclined even to appear to question one another’s judicial propriety.173 Consequently, where a challenged justice is slow to grant credence to a recusal motion or opposes it altogether, this puts the other state justices in a most uncomfortable position. Should they disagree with the challenged justice, they are in the position of at least being perceived as having besmirched the integrity of a colleague. In any small organization working in close quarters, members will be disinclined to create these sorts of inter-court frictions. As a result, full court review of a single justice’s refusal to recuse may be a relatively weak check on the challenged justice’s self-interest and self-perception.

170 See Stempel, Chief William’s Ghost, supra note 63; Debra Lyn Basset, Recusal and the Supreme Court, 56 HASTINGS L.J. 657, 692, n.172 (2004); Stempel, Rehnquist, Recusal and Reform, supra note 59, at 632-43.

One (to me, at least) disturbing example of such collegiality is the U.S. Supreme Court’s implicit attitude to a high profiles disqualification error made by then Justice William Rehnquist. Justice Rehnquist refused to recuse himself in \textit{Laird v. Tatum}, an action challenging Defense Department surveillance of civilians suspected of opposing the Vietnam War. Prior to joining the Court, Justice Rehnquist had, as head of the Justice Department’s Office of Legal Counsel in the Nixon Administration, been involved in assessing and approving the program’s legality and had supported the program, both as OLC head and in testimony at his confirmation hearings. Nonetheless, he refused to remove himself from the case when it reached the Supreme Court, casting a deciding vote that effectively ended the legal challenge to the surveillance program.

In the aftermath of the case and criticism of his role, Justice Rehnquist drafted a memorandum attempting to defend his decision and sought comment from Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justices Byron White and Potter Stewart. Although they varied in their advice about the wisdom of revisiting the issue in a written memorandum, all appeared to support Justice Rehnquist’s decision to sit on the case. After publication of the Rehnquist memorandum, Justice Powell sent a note of congratulatory approval.

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item See sources cited supra note 173.
\item See \textit{Laird v. Tatum}, 408 U.S. 1 (1972) (decision on the merits dismissing claim on justiciability grounds); Laird v. Tatum, 409 U.S. 824 (1972) (Rehnquist, J. Memorandum explaining and defending his decision not to recuse in case).
\item See \textit{Stempel, Chief William’s Ghost}, supra note 63, at Part I.C.
\item See id. at 1 (hand-written note from Justice Potter Stewart to “Bill” stating that he agreed with [Justice] “Byron” [White] that “publication of the [Rehnquist] memo [explaining and defending his decision not to recuse] would be basically healthy – it is informative, thoughtful, persuasive, and educational” although it will not “satisfy the \textit{N.Y. Times}, Washington Post, or other critics” of Rehnquist decision to participate in Laird v. Tatum). With all due respect to the well-regarded Justice Stewart, his assessment of the Rehnquist memorandum is clearly incorrect. The vast bulk of scholarly opinion has concluded that the Rehnquist participation in Laird v. Tatum was completely unjustified, primarily because of his involvement in the very conduct under review. See \textit{Stempel, Chief William’s Ghost}, supra note 63, at Part I.C. (collecting assessments, including those of noted judicial ethics experts Stephen Gillers and Geoffrey Hazard); \textit{Stempel, Rehnquist, Recusal and Reform}, supra note 59, at 589-632 (same plus finding additional flaws in Rehnquist memorandum). That Justice Stewart, even in a personal note, was not more willing to take issue with Justice Rehnquist’s mistakes, illustrates the difficulty of an isolated court reviewing the disqualification decisions of colleagues.

Worse, the Court continues to cite the Rehnquist Memorandum in seeming obliviousness to its flaws and tainted history. See, e.g., Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765, 777-78 (2002) (favorable citation to Rehnquist memorandum in majority opinion). In fairness to the Court and Justice Scalia, author of the White opinion, I note that the portion of the Rehnquist memorandum cited focused on a judge’s general judicial philosophy, correctly concluding that it ordinarily was not a basis for disqualification. Not every word of the Rehnquist memorandum is wrong. But it remains to me odd and disturbing that the Court would continue to look
\end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
Unfortunately, however, Justice Rehnquist’s participation in Laird v. Tatum was erroneous and indefensible, and his explanatory memorandum was misleading and unpersuasive.\textsuperscript{180} Nonetheless, it received de facto support of four justices, suggesting that even a very bad decision not to disqualify could have been rubber stamped had the Rehnquist recusal been reviewed by the full court.

Even in the Caperton opinion itself, one can see the impact of judicial collegiality. Justice Kennedy’s majority opinion, despite its disapproval of what happened below, takes pains to dispel any notion that it is accusing Justice Benjamin of wrongdoing.\textsuperscript{181} In particular, the majority tries to make clear that it does not see Justice Benjamin as having taken a bribe or having become embroiled in a quid-pro-quo arrangement with benefactor Blankenship. Readers might conclude that this is merely good manners on Justice Kennedy’s part and an aversion to kicking Justice Benjamin when he is down. But the Caperton majority opinion nonetheless suggests that jurists are very slow to make negative conclusions about one another. The dissents, of course, essentially thought Justice Benjamin did nothing wrong,\textsuperscript{182} another illustration of the practical reluctance judges have toward finding error or wrongdoing in another judge’s disqualification.\textsuperscript{183}

The majority acknowledges, as would any reasonable observer, that $3 million is a lot of money. But rather than blaming Benjamin for failing to see how receipt of such large sums made his participation in Caperton v. Massey problematic, the Caperton majority blames Blankenship for injecting the specter of influence peddling into judicial elections. \textsuperscript{184} “It’s takes two to tango” is a cliché, but one with some bite in this situation. Although Justice Benjamin could not prevent Blankenship individually or Blankenship-funded special interest groups from for guidance in the largely disgraced work product of a single Justice making a very incorrect decision regarding recusal.

\textsuperscript{179} See Stempel, Chief William’s Ghost, supra note 63, at n.126 (hand-written note from Justice Lewis Powell stating, “your splendid memorandum on ‘disqualification’ constitutes a conclusive answer to the motion.”).
\textsuperscript{180} See id. at Part I.C.; Stempel, Rehnquist Recusal and Reform, supra note 69, at 589-604.
\textsuperscript{181} See Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., 129 S. Ct. 2252, 2263-64, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *25 (2009) (“Justice Benjamin was careful to address the recusal motions and explain his reasons why, on his view of the controlling standards, disqualification was not in order. In four separate opinions issued during the course of the appeal, he explained why no actual bias had been established. . . . based on the facts presented by Caperton, Justice Benjamin conducted a probing search into his actual motives and inclinations; and he found none to be improper. We do not question his subjective findings of impartiality and propriety. Nor do we determine whether there was actual bias.”). See also id. at 2264-65, *32-33 (“Justice Benjamin did undertake an extensive search for actual bias.”).
\textsuperscript{182} See supra Part II.B, reviewing Roberts and Scalia dissents.
\textsuperscript{183} The same problem was manifested in Liljeberg v. Health Services Acquisition Corp., 486 U.S. 847 (1988), in which the Court narrowly (5-4) found disqualification required pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 455 of a judge whose behavior as jurist and trustee of a university with a land deal at stake in litigation was eye-brow raising to many, although not to the dissenting justices. Several years later, the trial judge in question was convicted of “bribery, conspiracy, and obstruction of justice in connection with his judicial duties” and sentenced to almost seven years imprisonment. See Stephen Gillers, Regulation of Lawyers 602 (8th ed. 2009). Liljeberg, like Caperton, suggests that the Court is slow to think anything but the best about a judge under challenge.
\textsuperscript{184} See Caperton, 129 S. Ct. at 2256-59, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4157 at *8-15 (directing most implicit criticism for problematic nature of case and 2004 West Virginia Supreme Court election at Blankenship as contributor and activist rather than at Justice Benjamin for failing to recuse).
supporting the Benjamin candidacy, Justice Benjamin could have easily refused to assist Blankenship in overturning a $50 million liability.

Justice Benjamin deserves more than a little scorn. Instead, even the majority that found his participation to violate due process treated him with kid gloves. Worse yet, four members of the Court (Justices Roberts, Scalia, Thomas and Alito) defended Justice Benjamin’s grotesquely bad error in judgment. Although the U.S. Supreme Court’s practice of giving each justice unfettered control over his or her participation in a case is close to disgraceful, the brutal, sad truth is that full Court review over the Court’s own recusal matters might not change things much. If the Justices are this reluctant to criticize a state court judge they have never met, how likely are they to effectively police one another?

Likewise, although full state supreme court review of disqualification motions affecting individual justices would be an improvement over West Virginia’s system, it should not be viewed as a panacea. Once again, evidence of the limits of this approach is right under our figurative noses. In Caperton v. Massey itself, the West Virginia high court divided 3-2, with Justice Benjamin in the majority and the dissenters criticizing his decision to participate. Consequently, the seemingly likely result of full state supreme court review in Caperton itself is a 2-2 deadlock concerning Justice Benjamin’s participation, a result that would leave Justice Benjamin on the case notwithstanding the extreme facts supporting disqualification.

Moreover, in some cases, full state supreme court review of disqualification may produce the other extreme. Some members of the full court could have substantially different judicial views than the challenged justice and may wish to use the recusal motion as an opportunity to remove the challenged justice from the case for strategic reasons. Although the default cultural norm in courts and similar small organizations (e.g., law firms, faculties, legislatures or city councils) is one of getting along and going along, the dynamic may occasionally shift to one of intense partisanship or personal dislike that creates the opposite effect. Instead of bending over backwards not to imply any ethical lapse in a colleague, some justices may grope to find reasons to support even a weak recusal motion.

For example, the Texas Supreme Court decisions of the 1990s produced a number of decisions reflecting sharp ideological splits. Although a solid conservative working majority dominated court decisions of the decade, there was a vocal minority of liberals usually in dissent. Apparent leaders of the warring factions were Republican John Cornyn, a former state attorney general and current U.S. Senator generally regarded as one of the body’s most conservative members and Democrat Lloyd Doggitt, currently a U.S. Representative as liberal as Cornyn is.

---

186 Sen. Cornyn attended St. Mary's School of Law in San Antonio, Texas, and received a Masters of Law from the University of Virginia Law School. He served as a Texas District Court Judge as well as state attorney general and Supreme Court Justice. As a political figure, Sen. Cornyn has been a supporter of the OPEN Government Act, a reform of the Freedom of Information Act. In his second year in the Senate, he served on the Deputy Whip team. In the Senate, Sen. Cornyn has served as the Vice Chairman of the Senate Republican Conference as well as the Chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee. Sen. Cornyn now serves on the Budget, Senate Finance and Judiciary Committees. United States Senator John Cornyn, Texas, About Senator Cornyn, http://cornyn.senate.gov/public/index.cfm?FuseAction=AboutSenatorCornyn.Biography (last visited Aug. 5, 2009). The National Journal recently ranked Sen. Cornyn as the 17th most Republican member of the Senate. Senate conservative. Their opinions provide some sharp exchanges from which a neutral observer would rather quickly note their opposing world views. Without implying that either man is particularly Machiavellian, one can easily imagine that justices of such opposing views would be tempted to vote strategically on recusal matters in hopes of having a resulting court makeup more likely to render decisions to their liking. A Cornyn-like judge would almost have to like seeing a Doggett-like disqualified and vice versa, at least if a case was close and possessed at least some ideological dimension.

The 1990s also provided an example of a less ideological or political but more personal conflict. The Nevada Supreme Court became involved in an intense internal battle rooted in part in personality clashes and overtly launched when trial judge Jerry Carr Whitehead was accused of judicial improprieties. To oversimplify, two members of the five-member Court sympathized with Judge Whitehead’s plight, tended to believe he was innocent, and wished to limit public reporting of the investigation surrounding him while two and sometimes three other justices viewed Judge Whitehead less favorably and sought greater public access of his and other judicial discipline proceedings. The result was several years of backbiting among the justices, including battles over recusal that many saw as proxies reflecting the larger battle rather than dispassionate analysis of disqualification matters.

---

188 See, e.g., Union Bankers Ins. Co. v. Shelton, 889 S.W.2d 278, 286 (Tex. 1994) (with Doggett in the majority and Cornyn authoring the dissent of a bad faith health insurance dispute; Cornyn's dissent calls the holding "just plain wrong"); Natividad V. Alexis Inc., 875 S.W.2d 695 (Tex. 1994) (Doggett dissenting from Cornyn majority opinion holding that contractual privity is required for the duty of good faith and fair dealing to extend to an insurance company's adjuster); Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co. of Pittsburgh, Penn. v. Dominguex, 873 S.W.2d 373, 377 (Tex. 1994) (Doggett dissenting from Cornyn majority holding that there was no evidence of bad faith denial on the part of the insurer, stating that "[t]his decision merely represents a predetermined result in search of a rationale").

189 Niccolo Machiavelli was a political adviser in Renaissance Italy who is generally viewed as amoral, unemotional, rational and ruthless in part because he was thought willing to use most any means to achieve desired ends. See Peter R. Reilly, Was Machiavelli Right? Lying in Negotiation and the Art of Defensive Self-Help, 24 OHIO ST. J. DISP. RESOL. (forthcoming 2009) (summary description of Machiavelli and his perceived legacy); Literature Resource Center, Niccolo Machiavelli Biography, http://people.brandeis.edu/~teuber/machiavellibio.html (last visited Aug. 3, 2009) See also NICCOLO MACHIAVELLI, THE PRINCE (Leo Paul S. de Alvarez trans., 1981) (1532) (providing guidance on how a prince can acquire a throne or retain power and advocating that the greatest moral good comes from having a stable state, even if cruel means must be used to achieve necessary ends). Arguably, Machiavelli has received an unduly negative reputation in that his views can be characterized more charitably. Nonetheless, the term “Machiavellian” has come to signify ruthless and calculating commitment to advancing one’s personal agenda.

D. Continuing Concern Over Substantive Due Process and Disqualification

Faced with the realistic limits of full state supreme court review of recusal matters, one can make a strong case that procedural due process requires that a neutral judicial body other than the state supreme court itself decide whether recusal is required. For example, the state supreme court could appoint a panel of judges to hear such motions. A state might also create a judicial disqualification commission that would hear such motions directed at supreme court justices. Although these mechanisms could pose state constitutional problems (particularly separation of powers if a non-judicial group is involved), they are well worth exploring as an alternative to allowing a usually tight-knit group of colleagues to sit in back-scratching judgment of one another.

But despite the practical concerns surrounding recusal at the state supreme court level, it appears that with modest tweaking, the state judicial systems can largely avoid the Caperton problem – even if Caperton disqualification is made congruent with recusal under the ABA Judicial Code – simply by putting in place better mechanisms for reviewing the self-interested decisionmaking of justices facing recusal motions. Coupled with the generally good supervision of disqualification decisions made by lower court judges, this suggests that a broader form of constitutional due process disqualification consistent with Judicial Code recusal would rarely require Caperton-style intervention by the U.S. Supreme Court. Consequently, one can with little effort imagine a world where state courts treat judicial disqualification more seriously with relatively little instance of U.S. Supreme Court supervision.

There still would remain the nagging problem of occasional miscarriages of justice in which a state supreme court (or a body reviewing the court’s recusal decisions) refuses to disqualify a judge or justice who clearly had no business participating in a particular case. In these cases, it would appear that the disappointed litigant seeking recusal received full procedural due process but nonetheless was denied the fundamental right to have only impartial jurists involved in deciding the merits of the litigant’s case. In these situations, one might reasonably view the litigant as having been denied substantive due process.

The question remains, however, whether the U.S. Supreme Court should reach such situations through Caperton-style invocation of the Due Process Clause. My view is that due process can properly be invoked to support such Supreme Court policing of the state courts.

---

191 See Goldberg, Sample & Pozen, supra note 167 (outlining procedural devices by which state courts can minimize the risk of error in denial of disqualification). A preliminary variant of this sort of review can take place if recusal motions at the trial level are decided in first instance by a trial judge other than that under challenge. This can occur either in first instance or as an intermediate check on the challenged judge’s decision prior to any eventual appellate review. For example, in Nevada state court, recusal motions are in first instance decided by the challenged judge. If the any litigant wishes, the challenged judge’s decision is then reviewed by the chief judge of the judicial district. The possibility of appellate review before the full state supreme court also exists. In addition, Nevada provides for each side in a civil action a right of preemptory challenge to the original assigned judge. See NEV. S. CT. R. 48.1(3); FLAMM, supra note 7, at §§ 27.11, 28.30. See also NEV. REV. STAT. § 1.225(5) (2008) (where state supreme court justice disqualified, “a district judge shall be designated to sit in his place as provided in Section 4 of Article 6 of the Constitution of the State of Nevada”).
Where a state judicial system’s disqualification determination, despite procedural review that seems fair ex ante, produces grotesquely wrong recusal decisions, the litigant has been denied a fundamental constitutional guarantee and U.S. Supreme Court intervention and correction is in order.\textsuperscript{192}

As discussed above, there is certainly similarity between Supreme Court policing state court punitive damages awards and policing of state court decisions involving participation of a judge who should have been disqualified.\textsuperscript{193} More important, participation of a tainted jurist goes right to the heart of the legal system’s aspiration for fair adjudication in which outcomes are not determined by the status of a litigant or lawyer. By contrast, a large damages award, even if unfair, remains the product of the system’s normal and “fair” operation, provided that the defendant received adequate procedural due process. But when a tainted judge participates, the litigant has suffered a per se denial of fair adjudication, regardless of the outcome. In such cases, the entire adjudication becomes infirm and a reviewing court is left wondering the degree to which the tainted judge’s participation may have made a difference.

E. Guidelines for Invoking Substantive Due Process Disqualification

1. In Campaign Support Cases

To be sure, intervention in state proceedings due to allegedly erroneous recusal should occur only sparingly. In determining whether to review such situations stemming from campaign support, the Court can continue to be guided by the factors set forth in \textit{Caperton} and amplified in the chief justices’ amicus brief,\textsuperscript{194} which sets forth the following “Criteria for evaluating whether due process requires recusal for campaign spending in a particular case.”\textsuperscript{195}

\begin{itemize}
  \item Size of the Expenditure;
  \item Nature of the Support;
  \item Timing of the Support;
  \item Effectiveness of the Support;
  \item Nature of the Supporter’s Prior Political Activities;
  \item Nature of the Supporter’s Pre-existing Relationship with the Judge; and \item Relationship Between the Supporter and the Litigant.\textsuperscript{196}
\end{itemize}

\textsuperscript{192} See \textit{supra} Part III.C (outlining rationale for viewing disqualification error as denial of due process).

\textsuperscript{193} See \textit{id.}

\textsuperscript{194} See Brief for Conference of Chief Justices, \textit{supra} note 44.

\textsuperscript{195} See \textit{id.} at 24 (capitalization removed).

\textsuperscript{196} See \textit{id.} at 24-29. The Brief for the American Bar Association supported a similar use of similar factors. See Brief for the American Bar Association, \textit{supra} note 43, at 19-20 (factors include contribution size, importance, timing, and relationship of judge and supporter).
Fleshing out the former chief justices’ list of considerations logically requires considering both the absolute and relative size of the not only cash outlays but also other, “in kind” campaign support such as signs, literature, volunteer workers, mailing or registration lists, phone banks, office space, and the like.

2. In General

In addition, the Court should consider additional factors relevant to the questions of (a) whether a litigant has been denied the fundamental right of adjudication before a neutral tribunal and (b) whether the denial of due process merits expenditure of the Court’s limited judicial resources:

- egregiousness of the error in refusing disqualification;
- importance of the underlying case (financially, socially, or politically);
- defensibility of the outcome in the underlying case;
- degree to which poor recusal decisions are part of a pattern in the particular state or court; and
- presence or absence of state-based corrective measures such as impeachment, revision of state judicial ethics codes, or removal of the offending judge or judges through election, retirement, or other means.

Using these templates to help determine the existence and magnitude of failure to recuse as a denial of substantive due process, the Court can act as an important backstop protecting litigant rights without unnecessarily entangling itself in state court disqualification practice. Applied to Caperton v. Massey, these factors auger in favor of the result reached by Justice Kennedy and the majority.

The first factor for filtering disqualification cases for the Court should be the apparent egregiousness of the error in refusing disqualification. In Caperton, the error was enormous. Even if Justice Benjamin’s clearly incorrect defense of his continued participation had been subject to fairer procedures such as full court review, it should not have been allowed to stand. A New York Times editorial also succinctly encapsulated my substantive reaction to the protests of the four Caperton dissenters.

Indeed, the only truly alarming thing about [the Caperton] decision was that it was not unanimous. The case drew an unusual array of friend-of-the-court briefs from across the political spectrum, and such an extreme case about an ethical matter that should transcend ideology should have united all nine justices.

---

197 In addition to his due process error, Justice Benjamin’s opinion is remarkable in that it never grapples with the most salient legal issue regarding his participation – whether he was, pursuant to Canon 3(E) of the West Virginia Judicial Code of Conduct, a judge whose impartiality could be reasonably questioned. See Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., 2008 W. Va. LEXIS (July 28, 2008) (Benjamin, J., dissenting).
Chief Justice Roberts is fond of likening a judge’s role to that of a baseball umpire. It is hard to imagine that professional baseball or its fans would trust the fairness of an umpire who accepted $3 million from one of the teams.

Applying the standard of 28 U.S.C. §455(a) and Rule 2.11 of the Model Judicial Code, it seems inarguable that that a reasonable lay observer would reasonably question Justice Benjamin’s ability to be impartial in an important case involving a company headed by his seven-figure campaign contributor.

Next, if one considers the financial, social, and political importance of the underlying case, Caperton’s intervention seems justified. The underlying fraud and tortuous interference litigation obviously involved a good deal of money, resulting in a $50 million judgment. It also involved a leading business in the state (coal mining) and at least one large and economically important litigant (Massey). It further attracted the attention of the state’s most important labor union, the United Mine Workers, which weighed in on Caperton’s side (Caperton had operated the Harman Mine as a union mine; when Massey wrested control, union jobs were lost). Further, the underlying case had significant implications for the manner in which business is conducted in the state. A victory for Massey logically would have, at least at the margin, encouraged sharper practices in the Blankenship mold.

Beyond this, the West Virginia Supreme Court’s acceptance of the Massey res judicata and forum selection arguments on appeal created the possibility of rather substantial changes in state procedural doctrine with attendant impact on future litigation. The West Virginia high court’s determination on these issues, at least until set aside by the U.S. Supreme Court, clearly expanded both the potential application of preclusion doctrine and the interpretative scope given to forum selection clauses.

A third filtering factor is the substantive outcome in this case involving participation by a tainted jurist whose partiality is subject to substantial question. Applied to Caperton, this factor supports the majority’s decision to intervene on due process grounds. Recall that in two decisions, the West Virginia court did not question the substantive outcome on the merits. Particularly in the first of its two decisions, the court essentially acknowledged that Massey had engaged in wrongful conduct toward Caperton. But on the basis of technical legal defense problematically applied, the West Virginia Supreme Court threw out a sizeable judgment against an apparently conceded wrongdoer. In addition, in Caperton v. Massey, the tainted jurist cast the deciding vote.

The fourth filtering factor – the degree to which poor recusal decisions are part of a pattern in the particular state or court – is less clear. However, there seems to be at least some significant evidence suggesting that West Virginia has not been particularly

---

198 Honest Justice, supra note 97.
199 See Gibeaut, supra note 13; Brief for UMW, supra note 45.
vigilant in ensuring that jurists do not participate in cases raising questions as to their impartiality. Without doubt, the state has been a hotbed of judicial politics that raise concerns about whether the judiciary has become excessively politicized.201

The fifth factor is presence or absence of state-based corrective measures such as impeachment, revision of state judicial ethics codes, or removal of the offending judge or judges through election, retirement, or other means. As of June 2009, Justice Benjamin was, unsurprisingly, still on the West Virginia high court, with his term running through 2016.202 There appears to have been no serious talk of his impeachment or retirement. Neither has there been suggested any amendment to the state’s judicial code to ensure that future jurists in his position must recuse.203

In sum, the five suggested factors or guiding Supreme Court invocation of substantive due process recusal point quite overwhelmingly in the direction of ejecting Justice Benjamin from the case, even if his participation had been permitted after full state supreme court review. In addition, since the grounds for the Benjamin disqualification are campaign related, consideration of the chief justices’ factors (amount of contribution, impact, recency, relation to the case) also strongly supports Justice Benjamin’s disqualification.

When facing future certiorari petitions involving due process disqualification, the Court can apply these factors (as well as those of the chief justices’ amicus brief in cases involving campaign support) to determine which cases, if any, present sufficiently serious disqualification problems to justify Supreme Court intervention in state judicial outcomes. Armed with these considerations, the Court need not accept an inordinate number of such cases. The Court would then be free to move from Caperton’s potentially problematic “probability of bias” standard to one mirroring the general norm: a litigant is denied due process when a state has insufficient procedural guarantees of correct disqualification decisions or when, despite procedural protections, a clearly disqualified judge participates in a matter.

Conclusion

Although its critics see Caperton as an unwise intrusion into state elections and state disqualification practice, Caperton’s biggest problem is that it did not go far enough and make due process congruent with prevailing state and federal disqualification standards. In particular, the Court should recognize that any error in failing to recuse deprives the affected litigant of a fundamental constitutional right – the right to have the case heard by a neutral magistrate. Consequently, any rejection of a request to recuse is at least technically one of constitutional dimension that should be potentially subject to U.S. Supreme Court review and correction.

Although there are good reasons to hesitate in creating or recognizing rights of substantive due process, the impartiality of the bench lies at the core of are notions of law and justice. When a case is heard by a judge that should have recused, this deprives the litigants of the very essence of fair adjudication and constitutes a type of error greater in kind and magnitude than other judicial mistakes. If the Court is to make any forays into the field of substantive due process, the case for such intervention greater here than in perhaps any other area of law.

Adopting the more straightforward reasonable-question-as-to-impartiality standard in lieu of the more problematic probability-of-bias standard should not strain judicial resources. The Court need not become mired in the flood of disqualification cases predicted by the dissenting doomsayers in Caperton. Insistence upon review of disqualification decisions by a neutral body of judges will largely ensure that litigants receive sufficient procedural due process. Where erroneous recusal decisions occur in spite of such safeguards, U.S. Supreme Court review should be available as necessary to vindicate the strong constitutional interest in neutral courts and fair adjudication, an interest sounding in substantive due process.

In making its assessments regarding whether review of non-disqualification is required, the Court should consider the five factors set forth in this article and the considerations outlined in the *Caperton*amicus brief submitted by the Conference of Chief Justices. Using these yardsticks, the Court can as necessary make infrequent forays into judicial disqualification matters without unduly burdening the court or creating either uncertainty or paranoia among state judges and justices.

Even if one accepts the implicit assertion of the Caperton dissenters that the decision was something like use of a “nuclear option,” both the constitutional interest in fair courts and the facts of the case justified this heavy artillery. So deployed, Caperton seems likely to have a positive effect in deterring poor disqualification decisions by state courts. Better still, the Court in Caperton could have harmonized the disqualification standards required by the Constitution with those required under federal law and state law modeled on the ABA Judicial Code. As shown in this article, unifying the constitutional and non-constitutional standards for judicial disqualification is feasible and can improve future Court supervision of recusal.