THE FUNDAMENTAL AND NATURAL LAW
‘REPUGNANT REVIEW’ ORIGINS OF
JUDICIAL REVIEW: A SYNERGY OF EARLY
ENGLISH CORPORATE LAW WITH NOTIONS OF FUNDAMENTAL AND

Introduction

Nowhere in the Constitution does it authorize judicial review. This lack of authorization has resulted in centuries of debates over the origins of judicial review. Many discussions of judicial review begin with Marbury v. Madison whereas others begin their analysis pre-Marbury. Numerous pre-Marbury scholars trace the origins to sixteenth and seventeenth century England. Any discussion of the “origins” of judicial review that ignores the early English sixteenth and seventeenth century practices and precedents is incomplete.

This article has two purposes. The first is to outline and summarize the various understandings of the origins of judicial review. The second purpose of this article is to set forth the proposition that the origins or judicial review did not arise from the pen of John Marshall in Marbury v. Madison, but rather took root in two ways; one in practice and one in thought: (1) early English courts’ practice of reviewing corporate by-laws for repugnancy to the laws of England and (2) that these “repugnant reviews” were grounded in the thought that principles of natural law control any human law. This article will argue that both this early practice and mode of thought influenced early colonial views pertaining to judicial review.

If looked at parsimoniously: early English corporate practice of repugnancy review, plus, review for consistency with natural law, plus, early American colonial courts reviewing legislative or executive acts for repugnancy with notions of natural law, equals: early English court influence on judicial review in pre-Marbury America.

Many scholars, perhaps in an attempt to “say something new” about judicial review, advocate for different understandings of its origins without acknowledging one very critical concept: that historical practices grounded in longevity are equally influential to historical modes of thought. Specifically, English corporate practices from the late sixteenth century on provided the early acceptance of a practice today known as judicial review. ¹ The English courts’ review of corporate practices in England, reviewing corporate by-laws and executive ordinances for “repugnancy” to the laws of England, likely gave the groundwork to the Founders’ for drafting the Constitution and its implicit inclusion of judicial review. ² However, those who advocate for the corporate origins of judicial review fail to assign due importance to the historical mode of thought that attached to such corporate reviews—that these reviews were likely premised on natural law. ³

The position advocated in this article stems from two different approaches of historical analysis placed alongside one another. Outlining the review of corporate practices by courts in England for repugnancy, ⁴ describing England’s relationship to its colonies during its imperialistic rulings, set alongside evidence that notions of natural law prevailed in the mind of men on both sides of the Atlantic will hopefully illuminate a different (not new) way of looking at the origins of judicial review. This view of the origin of judicial review seeks to combine and expound on two minority views of early constitutional law. First, Bonham’s Case was not a case of statutory interpretation but rather an exercise in reviewing an act of government for consistency with natural law. Second, this exercise [later to be known as judicial review] was rooted in early English corporate practice. The practice of courts reviewing corporate practices for repugnancy with natural law has striking similarities to the language used in early American courts reviewing their own governmental actions for consistency with natural and fundamental law—in the form of written constitutions. ⁶

Some disclaimers need be made before delving into the historical accounts. First, my thesis is limited insofar as it is a synthesis of two minority points of view: (1) English courts’ practice of reviewing Acts of Parliament in the form of corporate bylaws and ordinances and (2) these “repugnant reviews” asked whether the Act was consistent with natural law. Both, in turn, influenced early American thought. By connecting these two modes of analysis, a bridge of inferential logic may paint a new picture superimposed on an already familiar landscape.

Part I of this article provides general background information on the original understandings of judicial review. This section will first outline varying theories advocated by scholars and academics alike. However, the main thrust of Part I, though many dispute or ignore its relevance, is to emphasize the importance of my starting point: Bonham’s Case. Part II of this article describes the early instances of English courts reviewing corporate practices and by-laws for “repugnancy.” These instances were so well understood that early American constitutional theory assumed the existence of some sort of judicial review due to English courts engaging in these “repugnant reviews.” Part III sets forth the intent-based inquiry of early American constitutional thought linking the early English courts’ use of the word “repugnant” to instances of use in colonial America. Part IV revisits these “repugnant reviews” and demonstrates how these string of inferences, through the use of the word “repugnancy,” ultimately commands the conclusion that the Founders’ were influenced by these early repugnant reviews, both by corporate practice and review for consistency with natural law. It does so because the word repugnant, whether used in England or colonial America, was simultaneously associated with both natural law and the courts’ review of corporate practices.

I. Reviewing Judicial Review.

Most discussions concerning judicial review begin and end with Marbury v. Madison. Did John Marshall invent judicial review, or, was the concept originally understood pre-Marbury?

One of the dominant views is that of Larry Kramer, which argues that judicial review was originally [pre-Marbury] understood but rarely exercised unless statutes clearly violated the constitution. Dean William Traenor disputes Kramer’s position contending that judicial review before Marbury was commonly deployed rather than in only clear constitutional violation cases. The difference, he argues, is that courts would merely allocate differing standards of review dependant upon the subject matter of the litigation.

Conversely, another view is that judicial review of congressional legislation was never intended by the Framers and Marbury v. Madison was a sharp departure of the original understanding of courts’ roles. Professor Suzanna Sherry and others have argued for an elaborate original understanding of judicial review where statutes were examined to determine whether they violated natural law, or if statutes were inconsistent with the written constitution.

Scholars have argued that judicial review was present “in the thoughts of the patriots, the words of the Founders and the actions of the states.” Others contend that judicial review resulted from early American discontent with legislative supremacy. Kramer has argued that the Constitution never authorized judicial review whereas Professor Prakash and Professor Yoo’s well received article argues that both the text and structure of the Constitution clearly intended to authorize judicial review. One even advocates for the complete abrogation of judicial review. These scholars, and the many others that have discussed judicial review, start their analysis in many different places. In my mind, the only appropriate beginning point is Bonham’s Case and the determination of whether or not Coke’s infamous statement influenced early American constitutional theory.

In Bonham’s Case, The College of Physicians imprisoned Dr. Bonham for practicing medicine without a license after repeated attempts to prevent him from doing so. Dr. Bonham argued the college’s incorporation did not authorize imprisonment. In front of Chief Justice Coke, Dr. Bonham’s claim for false imprisonment was accepted—and Coke’s famous statement flowed from pen into history:

> And it appears in our books, that in many cases, the common law will controul Acts of Parliament, and sometimes adjudge them to be utterly void: for when an Act of Parliament is against common right and reason, or repugnant, or impossible to be performed, the common law will controul it, and adjudge such Act to be void;

The essence of Coke’s statement was that letters patent—the corporate charter given to the College of Physicians from Parliament—was in part void because the charter made the College both judge and jury in imprisoning Dr. Bonham. In doing so, Coke seems to have been appealing to some form of fundamental or natural law. Allowing a corporation to be judge and jury in the case of imprisoning its professionals is against principles of natural law because the phrase “against reason” was “the familiar reference to the immutable law of nature.” If notions of natural law were present, this is an example of a court, subordinate to almighty Parliament, invalidating Parliamentary actions by reviewing it for consistency with principles of natural law.

21 Id.
The prevailing and entirely reasonable argument is that Coke’s statement was not intended to limit the supremacy of Parliament, but was rather merely an exercise in statutory interpretation. Under this view, Coke’s statutory construction lent nothing to judicial review as understood by John Marshall or today’s court. Raoul Berger’s position is to the contrary: “It [judicial review] did not require acceptance of such later concepts as separation of powers and the like to declare judicially what was generally accepted: a ‘positive’ law that violated the law of nature was ‘no law.’”

The determination of whether Coke’s statement influenced colonial American constitutional theory has centered on the debate of statutory construction or constitutional interpretation. That is, whether Coke’s position was that fundamental and/or natural law principles constrained Parliament, or whether his arguments were merely a routine exercise in statutory interpretation. But this discussion is incomplete.

A more complete view is that Coke’s statement likely influenced early American thought because he did intend to constrain acts of Parliament “against common right and reason” insofar as it related to common early English corporate practice. The exercise of reviewing corporate charters and letters patent for validity was common practice in Coke’s day. These corporate practices focused on one determination: whether the corporate charter was “repugnant” to the laws of England. Thus, not only did judicial review likely have its origins in a natural law repugnant review, but its origins incidentally were grounded in corporate practice.

II. A “Repugnant” Review.

The great Lord Ellsmore once inquired, “If the words of a statute be contrary or repugnant, what is there then to be said?” Coke would invalidate laws that were “against common right and reason, or repugnant” to the laws of England. Likewise, whether Marshall was correct or not, he was clear: “It is a proposition too plain to be contested, that the constitution controls any Berger’s article argues the opposite point but uses the previous source as a counterargument to his position that Coke’s statement was not mere statutory construction. Berger argues it was an exercise in constitutional, fundamental, or natural law review wherein Coke set forth the proposition that even almighty Parliament is constrained by “common right and reason.”

24 Bilder, supra note 1, at 507. Throughout this paper, Mary Bilder’s recent Yale Law Journal article is heavily relied upon both for its views and well developed research materials. Many primary and secondary sources have been pulled from her well-crafted article. The organization of Bilder’s article is also borrowed at times. For example, the first portion of her article delves into the history of “repugnancy” in legal discourse. So too does this paper focus on a repugnant review insofar as it relates to the corporate origins portion of this paper. While I borrow her views for most of the corporate practice arguments and sources, she argues English corporate law eventually became a “transatlantic constitution binding American colonial law by a similar standard of not being repugnant to the laws of England.” My position is that Bilder is correct in corporate practices influencing or catalyzing this type of review, but rather fundamental principles of natural law is what influenced colonial courts more so than the corporate practice itself.

legislative act repugnant to it; or, that the legislature may alter the constitution by an ordinary act.”

The word “repugnant” is used six times in Marbury.

Are theses uses of the word repugnant coincidental? It seems that the two most important decisions in history pertaining to the original understanding of judicial review both use the same terminology when a court reviews a legislative act. While scholars dispute the influence of Bonham’s Case on discussions of judicial review, no one seems to deny that Marbury officially set down the principle in American law. Some have said that Marbury invented judicial review whereas the vast majority of scholars argue that Marbury merely codified a preexisting principle—the principle that federal and state courts may review legislative or executive acts for constitutionality. Regardless of the credence one lends to Bonham’s Case or Marbury v. Madison, a look into “repugnant” reviews by early English courts compel the conclusion that judicial review had a long history beginning in England, and was primarily used when courts reviewed corporate by-laws and ordinances for “repugnancy” to fundamental principles of natural law.

To start a corporation in sixteenth century England, none other than Chief Justice Coke “summed up the medieval rules and laid down the modern rule.” Coke in the Case of Sutton’s Hospital outlined four ways in which to lawfully incorporate. “Lawful authority of incorporation” was only proper by royal charter, an act of Parliament, prescription, or by the common law. State sanction was thus required for incorporation.

However, according to Holdsworth, an Act of Parliament can “of course do anything; so that it can give a corporation power which, without such a sanction, would infringe the principles of the common law . . . “ This statement seems inconsistent with Coke’s view that an Act of Parliament repugnant to common right or reason is “utterly void.” But this type of repugnant review seems to be a longstanding English corporate practice.

As a matter of fact, Holdsworth even recognized that corporate by-laws “were always liable to be called in question before the king’s courts.” Courts addressed constitutional limits on corporate by-laws, ordinances, and authority in at least six cases preceding Bonham’s Case. Cases in which early English courts reviewed corporate by-laws for validity preceding Bonham’s Case

Feldman notes that both words appear in Bonham’s Case and in Marbury v. Madison. Feldman assumes that the word repugnant was rare in legal discourse and Bilder’s article rebukes this assumption demonstrating persuasively that English courts commonly used repugnant in its corporate cases and thereafter colonial courts followed in using “repugnant.” See Bilder, supra note 1, at 513-515.

were: The Chamberlain of London’s Case (1590); Doggerell v. Pokes (1595); Bab v. Clerk (1595); Wilford v. Masham (1595); Clark’s Case; and Davenant Hurdis (1599). An independent review of several of these cases confirms what Mary Bilder has already concluded: corporate by-laws were routinely reviewed for repugnancy.

For example, in The Chamberlain of London’s Case, the King’s Court upheld a corporate ordinance but Coke exclaimed that “ordinances, constitutions or by-laws” that “are contrary or repugnant to the laws or statutes of the realm are void and of no effect.” If by this early statement Coke meant notions of natural law could void Parliament then this is evidence that a court could invalidate an act of Parliament.

Moreover, in Clark’s Case (1596), Clark was imprisoned under an incorporated town’s charter and this practice was found contrary to the Magna Carta. In Davenant v. Hurdis (1599) the court stated that a corporation could only make ordinances that were “not contrary to the laws and constitutions of the king, nor in prejudice to the majority of citizens of London.” These instances of review by a court suggest that early English courts had some power of judicial review by reviewing an Act of Parliament for repugnancy. This exercise of power by a court was not readily known as judicial review because it initially had no name because it was not an intellectual invention.

These cases and corporate practices, alongside the well-founded conclusion that early English courts could determine whether legislative and executive acts were repugnant to natural law set the stage for early colonial influence. Even Holdsworth acknowledged that “no human law which was contrary to these universal laws [of “nature or reason”] was valid.”

Mary Bilder’s contribution to the preceding views and historical accounts is undeniably invaluable. But before delving into early American case law and debate, clarity again demands illumination of the difference between her view and mine. Bilder claims that these corporate practice reviews, which also extensively occurred in the colonies, created a “transatlantic constitution binding American colonial law.” Bilder rebuffs the theory that judicial review for consistency with fundamental principles of natural law played a significant role in the origins of 38 Id. Bilder is responsible for finding these cases. However, particular cases were pulled for an independent review.

39 After reviewing primary and secondary sources from both English and American Scholars, it is still not entirely clear whether English courts conducting reviews of corporate ordinances were applying constitutional law, mere statutory construction, or applying fundamental principles of natural law. However, it is most likely that these early English courts were reviewing the corporate by-laws for consistency with natural law. It was the prevailing view in seventeenth century England that fundamental principles of natural were transcendent and superior “to the positive law enacted by human institutions.” See Larry D. Kramer, The People Themselves: Popular Constitutionalism and Judicial Review at 10 (2004) (citing Charles Grove Harris, The American Doctrine of Judicial Supremacy 21 (1914).

judicial review. I agree with her premise but the more complete view is that court review for repugnancy to the laws of England and its unwritten constitution cannot be divorced from reviewing acts in light of natural law. Hence, judicial reviews origins stem both from corporate and natural law reviews.

The primary reason why courts could review these types of acts from a superior body without controversy is because courts were at times applying natural law—a law higher than human law. Therefore, the dispositive difference between the English system of judicial review and the American model is that both the State and Federal Constitutions codified many of the fundamental and natural law principles. Early colonial thought suggests that judicial review stemmed from some sort of repugnant review.

III. Early American Thought.

This section will delve into colonial case law and historical debates to suggest that some form of judicial review was accepted pre-Marbury and that this form likely stemmed from courts determining whether legislative and executive acts were repugnant to principles of fundamental and natural law codified in written constitutions. The concrete nature of written constitutions probably catalyzed a more robust form of judicial review than that found in sixteenth and seventeenth century England.

First, this section will discuss two unquestionable examples of pre-Marbury cases establishing judicial review was present before John Marshall penned Marbury. Second, both of these cases use the word repugnancy in describing judicial review. Third, after establishing that early colonial courts used some form of judicial review, choosing to use the word repugnancy in doing so, subsections (C) and (D) will provide other examples of the use of the word “repugnant” in early colonial corporate practices and during the Constitutional Convention debates.

48 Id. Another relevant difference is the general distrust of government evident in the structural makeup of our political system. I would presume this is common among countries that ratify constitutions post-revolution, gaining their independence from another imperial nation. This could be another explanation for the robustness of our model of judicial review as compared to that of England’s. However, discussion on this point is outside the scope of this paper.

50 William M. Traenor, The Case of the Prisoners and the Origins of Judicial Review, 143 U. Pa. L. Rev. 491 (1994). Traenor obtained Edmund Randolph and St. George Tucker’s handwritten notes from this time period and scrupulously examined both sets. His article also outlines numerous primary sources. All factual assertions in the discussion of the Case of Prisoners have been drawn from his article. It is of course extremely relevant to discussions of judicial review before Marbury v. Madison since “as a member of the Federal Constitutional Convention, Randolph proposed the Virginia Plan, the principal source for the Federal Constitution, and he
June 15, 1782, by the Virginia General Court. Caton, Lamb, and Hopkins petitioned the Virginia House of Delegates for a pardon. The House voted in favor of the pardon but the Senate voted against the pardon.

Virginia’s Treason Act stated that both houses must agree to allow a pardon. However, Virginia’s state constitution seemed only to require the consent of the House, which the three prisoners had already obtained. In October, 1782, the prisoners argued in front of the Virginia General Court that the statute violated the state constitution thus the pardon was effective. Attorney General Edmond Randolph argued the opposite requesting an order of execution. The General Court ultimately refused to decide the issue determining that the issue should be presented to Virginia’s highest court, the Virginia Court of Appeals.

Sitting on the Virginia Court of Appeals were Edmund Pendleton, George Wythe, John Blair, Paul Carrington, Bartholomew Dandridge, Peter Lyons, James Mercer, and Richard Cary. One of the questions presented to the court was “whether a Court of Law could declare an Act of the Legislature void because it was repugnant to the Act for the Constitution of Government?” Attorney General Edmund Randolph apparently advocated that the court did have the power to declare a statute unconstitutional, however, his precise position was that the statute and constitution were consistent and thus the court avoid declaring the statute void, thus an order for execution was proper. The three prisoners responded to Randolph’s arguments: “The act of assembly was contrary to the plain declaration of the constitution; and therefore void.”

After hearing Randolph and the three prisoner’s arguments the court heard from amicus advocates including St. George Tucker. Tucker also advocated for judicial review although his justification was premised on separation of power principles, both in theory (Montesquieu) and in substance (the Virginia Constitution).

On November 2, 1782, the Virginia Court of Appeals handed down its decision by way of eight different opinions from each respective Justice. Comparing the Reporter Daniel Call’s records with that of Chancellor Pendleton’s notes, conflicting versions of the rationale emerge. Call’s subsequently was the first United States Attorney General and, later, Thomas Jefferson’s successor as Secretary of State.” Id. at 494.

records suggest that all eight judges accepted Randolph’s statutory construction argument, however, seven of them agreed in dicta that the court could declare a statute unconstitutional.

On the other hand, Pendleton’s notes may indicate that at least two of the judges sided wholeheartedly sided with the prisoners. Justice Mercer seemed to hold the statute unconstitutional while Justice Dandridge ruled for the prisoners in that the statute and constitution provided independent ways for obtaining a pardon and the prisoners did receive a valid pardon under the constitution. Only Justice Lyons specifically rebuked judicial review while the five others held the Treason Act constitutional. Most notably, Justice Wythe advocated that “to prove that an Anti-constitutional Act of the Legislature would be void; and if so, that this Court must in Judgment declare it so, or not decide according to the Law of the land.”

This case is arguably the best evidence of the origins of judicial review in pre-Marbury America especially due to the prominence of such figures involved as Madison, Tucker, Randolph, Pendleton, and Wythe. The presence of judicial review in this case is practically undeniable. Whether notions of fundamental or natural law were present is a closer question. However, it is likely that in reviewing whether the statute was inconsistent or “repugnant” with the Virginia constitution, natural law principles were present and fundamental law was codified in the Virginia constitution.

B. Vanhorne’s Lessee v. Dorrance.

Vanhorne’s Lessee is another prime example of judicial review taking root the New Republic. Vanhorne’s Lessee v. Dorrance was a property dispute between the defendant John Dorrance and the plaintiff Thomas Van Horne. The uncontested facts of the case were as follows: William and Thomas Penn presented to the court “a Deed from the Six Nations” along with a map of the land and proper survey. Subsequently William and Thomas Penn granted to Thomas Vanhourne a lease, for a term of seven years, of lot No. 38 containing one hundred acres. Another lease was executed from the Penns’ to Thomas Vanhourne for lot No. 20. Thomas Vanhourne then leased lot No. 20 to Cornelius Vanhourne. It was then found in evidence that one John Dorrance was in possession of lot No. 20 and he claimed that his deed received from Indians was valid under Pennsylvania’s Quieting and Confirming Act.

Justice William Patterson addressed the question presented whether the confirming act was constitutional, “or, in other words, whether the Legislature had authority to make that act.” Justice Patterson delved into an analysis comparing the power of a court to review legislative acts in England and in the New Republic. Patterson acknowledged that the primary difference between English review and that in America was that England’s constitution was unwritten whereas the Federal Constitution was written. The general position in England was that Parliament cannot be questioned by judicial department, but “whatever may be the case in other countries, yet in this there can be no doubt, that every act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is absolutely void.”

Patterson ultimately found the confirming act unconstitutional and judicial review began to take root. Both Van Hourne’s Lessee and the Case of Prisoners demonstrate pre-Marbury judicial review. In addition, both cases used the corporate derived “repugnancy review” to review legislative actions for constitutionality.

C. Colonial Corporate Practice.

Around the time of Dr. Bonham’s Case, early colonials were arriving and settling in America. The authority to govern certain geographic areas was granted to the colonists by the Crown by way of letters patent. These early grants formed domestic corporations in colonial America.

In drafting the letters patent, a requirement surfaced within the letter patent that corporate by-laws not be repugnant or contrary to English law. For example, Virginia’s 1611 charter imposed that laws “be not contrary.” Likewise, the 1620 New England charter, the 1629 Massachusetts Bay charter, and the 1662 and 1663 Connecticut and Rhode Island charters contained similar language requiring that corporate by-laws not be repugnant to the law of England.

Subsequently, the Privy Council “reviewed over 8500 colonial acts from colonial legislatures and around 250 appeals from colonial courts that had themselves struggled over the relationship between colonial law and the laws of England.” If nothing else, this establishes the very reasonable and defensible inference that early English corporate practice of reviewing English corporate practices for repugnancy to the laws of England made its way to the colonies and was a pervasive practice.

D. The Early Debates of Judicial Review.

Now that the link between early English practice and early colonial practice has been established, a review of early colonial debates may shed light on whether these practices influenced early colonial thought.

Discussions of judicial review most commonly occurred during the 1787 Constitutional Convention when debates centered on the Council of Revision.\(^80\) During the debate, Massachusetts’s Rufus King held the position that federal judges should not have power to declare laws invalid in the Council of Revision because they already had the power to “stop the operation of such as shall appear repugnant to the constitution.”\(^81\)

Pennsylvania’s James Wilson disagreed with Rufus King contending that a judge did have the power to hold a law unconstitutional, but that this power “did not go far enough.”\(^82\) James Madison himself stated that “a law violating a constitution established by the people themselves, would be considered by the Judges as null & void.”\(^83\)

Seven years after the ratification of the Constitution in 1791, Supreme Court Justice Chase in referring to reviews of legislative acts for consistency with natural law stated:

> There are certain vital principles in our free Republican governments, which will determine and over-rule an apparent and flagrant abuse of legislative power . . . . An act of the Legislature (for I cannot call it a law) contrary to the great first principles of the social compact, cannot be considered a rightful exercise of legislative authority.\(^84\)

Justice Chase’s embrace of natural law principles despite the existence of a written constitution demonstrates the pervasiveness of the concept that constitutions, whether written or unwritten, that legislatures, whether omnipotent (Parliament) or coordinate, are constrained by natural law.

IV. A Repugnant Review, Revisited—Natural Law Controls

Cases such as Bonham’s Case, Clark’s Case, and Chamberlain of London’s Case establish that early English courts likely reviewed Acts of Parliament through their grants of corporate powers for “repugnancy” with fundamental principles of natural law.\(^86\) Coke’s words “against common right and reason” carries with it notions of both natural and fundamental law.\(^87\) Coke’s statement

thus concluded that a legislative act allowing a corporation to be both judge and jury was repugnant to natural law, or in other words, “common right and reason.”

“That the law of nature...is also called the law of reason’ and that English lawyers were accustomed to say that if anything be prohibited by the law nature...it is against reason.” It is reasonable to assume that a seventeenth-century lawyer may presume that “against reason” was interchangeable with “against the law of nature.”

Because of the numerous instances and thus linkage between corporate practice review for repugnancy with natural law (“against reason”), despite authorization from almighty Parliament, it is not unreasonable to associate the word “repugnant” with both natural law and corporate practice. Hence, while the practice of reviewing legislative or royal acts for repugnancy occurred in the corporate context, concepts of natural law invalidated these laws.

But what seems undeniable is that Coke held the steadfast position that “common right and reason” was the determination of constitutionality and that only judges had the skill and wisdom to make these decisions. “No human law which was contrary to these universal laws [of “nature or reason”] was valid.” This is not to say that parliamentary supremacy was not in full tilt. Coke did not espouse the position that he as Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas was the final word. Rather, his view holding judges in the highest regard can be reconciled with notions of parliamentary supremacy since Coke, “himself half medievalist, he still regarded Parliament as a court: the High Court of Parliament, last appeal above King’s Bench.” It was the routine practice of reviewing corporate charters for consistency [the opposite of “repugnancy”] with notions of natural law that influenced Coke’s placement of the “wisdom of the judges...above the wisdom of the legislature, and sealed his faith with the witness of his 91 The best way to understand judicial review is that the early American cases, debates, and statements were all influenced by a longstanding practice of English courts reviewing corporate charters for “repugnancy.” This is Bilder’s view. While ideas and theories frequently present themselves in the historical context, practices and traditions of certain institutions inherently have more resilience. Coke’s court commonly reviewed corporate charters provided by Parliament for repugnancy. Whether this was statutory construction or constitutional review is very relevant as a condition precedent to corporate practice influence. If only statutory construction, Bonham’s Case would likely be less influential to American courts dealing with statutes. But if Chief Justice Coke did in fact have fundamental principles of natural law in mind when stating that an act of Parliament may be held void if repugnant to “common right and reason” then this provides a sturdy basis for early American influence. It does so in two senses. First, it is a pure instance of a court addressing a superior portion of government. Second, it establishes that even the omnipotent Parliament is controlled by some higher principle—natural law.

career.”97 According to Boyer, Coke “formulated the principle of judicial review and his defense of this proposition provided the paradigm of the independent judge.”98

The link to American judicial review, even disregarding corporate practices or the use of the word “repugnant,” is the fact that early state Constitutions and ultimately our Federal Constitution codified many natural law principles and “suddenly the fundamental law and the first principles99 that Englishman had referred to for generations had a degree of explicitness and reality that they never before quite had.”100 Parliament’s granting of charters in England paralleled those colonial charters bestowed upon American colonies, as Gordon Wood has written, the state constitutions “were still identified in the minds of many with their old colonial charters, as contracts between magistrates and people, defining and delimiting the power and rights of each.”101 By codifying notions of natural and fundamental law—reducing the principles used by English courts to review Acts of Parliament for repugnancy—concreteness and explicitness now defined the government’s relationship with the people.102

What is even more important is not what Coke meant but how his infamous statement was understood in colonial America. As has been nicely put, “a seventeenth-century lawyer and a later Colonial might well have understood—as, in fact, they did—Coke to mean simpliciter that no Act of Parliament could contravene ‘fundamental’ law.”103 While the previous statement was made by a legally trained mind, even great historians agree that “almost all eighteenth-century Englishmen on both sides of the Atlantic had recognized something called fundamental law as a guide to the moral rightness and constitutionality or ordinary law and politics.”104 Blackstone himself, despite his strict adherence to Parliamentary Sovereignty believed that natural law could control an Act of Parliament.105

Perhaps the best example, James Otis argued in the Writs of Assistance Case (1761) that the issuance of general warrants was illegal and sought to have them outlawed. Delivering one of the most famous arguments in legal history,106 Otis cited Coke’s infamous statement in

It appears to me the worst instrument of arbitrary power, the most destructive English liberty and the fundamental principles of law, that was ever found in English lawbook . . . The writ prayed for in this petition, being general, is illegal. It is a power that places the liberty of every man in the hands of every petty officer . . . A man’s house is his castle; and whilst he Bonham’s Case arguing that general warrants were “against common right and reason.” Therefore, Otis’ statement is great evidence that colonials understood both Coke’s statement to incorporate notions of natural law with judicial review. Otis was attempting to persuade the judiciary to review the act of the executive in executing general warrants, though his argument proved unsuccessful.

Otis’ statements seems to be drawing on both notions of natural law and fundamental law—that is, it is against both God given rights and reason to allow a general warrant. Again, this is 1761, twenty-seven years before the constitutional convention.

V. Conclusion

Examining the origins of judicial review, to some, may seem a futile exercise. Whether or not we ever come to an accurate understanding of its origins, judicial review seems like it is here to stay (whether it was intended or not). But the benefit of these historically-driven analyses is that the present will soon be gone and historical accounts may inform our future constitutional doctrines. It was true then, and it is true today, that “a page of history is worth a volume of logic.”

If the Supreme Court were to find fifty years from now that the current form of judicial review was too expansive, inconsistent with the Founders’ intent, how far would the Court roll back judicial review? Originalist inquiries are important to anticipate these issues and are equally important in other areas of constitutional law. For example, one hotly debated constitutional principle is the exclusionary rule. The Supreme Court adopted the exclusionary rule in federal courts in 1914. This rule was extended to the states in Mapp v. Ohio, almost five decades later. Portions of the current debate surround on whether the exclusionary rule is constitutionally required, or, whether it may be replaced with a more effective remedy.

Timothy Lynch argues that separation of power principles justifies the exclusionary rule and that it is constitutionally required. On the other hand, Akhil Amar argues that it may be replaced with 42 U.S.C. 1983 suits as an available remedy to defendants that have had their civil rights violated. Many others have proposed other means for replacing the exclusionary rule and thus, implicitly advocate that the Constitution does not require the exclusionary rule’s existence. But if the Supreme Court were ever to test the exclusionary rule’s existence, historical accounts of the Founders’ and colonials’ practices and thoughts would surely be relevant to question.

is quiet, he is as well guarded as a prince in his castle. This writ, if it should be declared legal, would totally annihilate this privilege. Customhouse officers may enter our houses when they please; we are commanded to permit their entry . . . Bare suspicion without oath is sufficient . . . Every man prompted by revenge, ill humor, or wantonness to inspect the inside of his neighbor’s house may get a writ of assistance.”

Linked with judicial review, suppose Professor’s Prakash and Yoo are correct that both the text and structure (separation of powers) principles clearly authorized judicial review. If so, this would certainly bolster Timothy Lynch’s argument that the exclusionary rule, though not mentioned in the Fourth Amendment, is required and justified by separation of power principles. By extension, the judiciary must exclude evidence to perform a “check” on the executive. The history of the origins of the exclusionary rule, like the origins of judicial review, may become of utmost importance in future discussions pertaining to either of their legitimacy.

In addition, recall at the end of Part IV the example of James Otis citing Coke’s infamous statement in Bonham’s Case during the Writs of Assistance Case. Otis’ ultimate goal, presumably, was to exclude the evidence obtained by the execution of a general warrant and in turn, his client would go free. Any in-depth analysis of the Writs of Assistance Case relates to both judicial review and the exclusionary rule. Also recall that case occurred in 1761, twenty-seven years before the Constitutional Convention. A further understanding of the origins of judicial review fills in historical gaps in many areas of constitutional law and theory evidenced by the cross-section of the exclusionary rule and judicial review some two hundred and forty-seven years ago. Examining the history and origins of judicial review may unearth facts, inferences, or other accounts that are relevant not only to judicial review, but other constitutional doctrines as well.

A historical analysis of both early English, colonial, and American practices and thoughts demonstrate that judicial review stemmed from corporate practices being reviewed for consistency with principles of fundamental and natural law. When our constitutions, state and federal, were reduced to writing, codifying certain fundamental and natural law notions, judicial review took root in a more concrete form—because courts were dealing with a concrete document.

If “a page of history is worth a volume of logic,” hopefully this alternative historical view will alter the way some of the pages of history are viewed, and thus revise a section in the volume of logic.
