Astor Piazzolla (1921-1992) was born in Mar del Plata, Argentina, and spent part of his childhood in New York City. A virtuoso bandoneón player, Piazzolla made his trade mark in the thirties and forties as a tanguero in the band of Aníbal Troilo, and then as the central figure in his own band. As his compositions grew in complexity, he turned to classical music. He studied composition with Alberto Ginastera and in 1954 was granted a scholarship to study in Paris with the legendary Nadia Boulanger. There he realized his destiny was not to abandon tango but to infuse it with classical and jazz influences. Since the beginning of Piazzolla's career, his tango arrangements and original compositions were not well-received due to his innovations and progressive musical ideas. In an interview, he said: "In Argentina you can change anything but the tango." It was a curse that followed him his entire career. However, the Argentine tango is one of the most recognized popular music genres in the world today, due to Piazzolla's prolific output and virtuoso concert style.

Le Grand Tango

Le Grand Tango was written in 1982 and published in Paris (thus the French title). The piece is dedicated to the great Russian cellist Mstislav Rostropovich, who did not play it until 1990. Although written as a single movement, it contains three distinct and contrasting sections. The two outer sections are energized by the use of accented rhythms, while the middle section contains expressive, lyrical dialogues between the cello and piano. In many ways, adapting a work for cello translates well to the bassoon since these instruments have such similar voices. The challenges come with the difference in range, the bassoon's inability to play double stops and lack of rests. Because bassoonists rely on breath to make sound, this piece is deceptively taxing. In this performance, the sections have been separated into movements with pauses in between to allow for necessary recovery. Luckily, the song like quality of the work makes the other elements easier to overcome and allows the spirit of the piece to shine through no matter the instrument.
Tango Etudes

Piazzolla composed the Tango Etudes late in his life (1987) for solo flute. They quickly became popular with other instrumentalists and unaccompanied versions were adapted for violin and saxophone. The version you will hear this evening is sometimes mistakenly said to have been arranged by Claude Delangle, saxophonist and professor at the esteemed Conservatoire National Supérieur de Musique of Paris. In fact, Delangle requested the etudes be harmonized by Piazzolla himself who indulged and scored the piece for saxophone and piano.

Unfortunately when the work arrived in the mail, the handwritten score was practically illegible as Piazzolla admitted in a letter that said, “Dear friend, finished the piano part...for saxo alto and piano...Good luck to Mr Delangle and please tell him to forgive my music handwriting. I was in a hurry...” At this point the score was shelved as Piazzolla’s health subsequently deteriorated and could not be consulted about the manuscript before his death in 1992. Many years later pianist Yann Ollivo painstakingly deciphered the score and produced the realization that was published in 2003.

The etudes are a collection of melodies that alternate between bold energetic dance like figures and beautiful lyrical passages to keep the listeners attention. In classic Piazzolla style, the music sometimes becomes very angular and dissonant creating much angst, but eventually returns to a familiar theme. At times the melodies are rubato, almost recitative like while at other times they invoke a meditative or sad mood usually marked tristement. These six etudes take the performers on a wild adventure testing their technical and musical skills while leaving plenty of room for creative expression.
Las Cuatro Estaciones Porteñas

Las Cuatro Estaciones Porteñas (The Four Seasons of Buenos Aires) were composed between 1965 and 1970. They were conceived as stand-alone pieces rather than a suite, although Piazzolla performed them together on a few occasions. To those born there, the word Porteño refers to the capital city of Buenos Aires. We present these pieces in the order the seasons occur in the southern hemisphere, where the year starts with Summer, followed by Autumn, Winter, and finally Spring. Typical of Piazzolla’s music, each movement uses the juxtaposition of exciting rhythmic sections followed by expressive melodic ones. They also contain improvisation-like parts in which each instrument is given the opportunity to solo. This work was originally conceived for his quintet composed of violin, bandoneon, electric guitar, piano, and double bass. It has been arranged for several chamber formations including violin, cello and piano, which was the basis for our own arrangement for soprano saxophone, bassoon and piano. Since these pieces were essentially composed for strings, adjustments in tempo, articulation, dynamics, transposition and octave choices have been made to allow them to be played on instruments whose sound production is so different.
