The Judicial Restraint of the Warren Court (and Why it Matters)

Abstract: The Judicial Restraint of the Warren Court (and Why it Matters)

This article argues that the strongest contribution that the Warren Court made to expanding equality rights was not its judicial activism in protecting those rights, but its restraint in allowing Congress to protect those rights. This argument may seem counter-intuitive given that the Warren Court is practically synonymous with judicial activism. Indeed, the Warren Court’s activism in protecting individual rights provides the paradigm for those constitutional scholars who argue that an active judiciary is necessary for the adequate protection of those rights. However, this paradigm is relatively new. Prior to the Warren Court, supporters of equality rights had advocated judicial restraint, not judicial activism. They recognized that throughout our history Congress has done far more to protect equality rights than have the federal courts.

The Warren Court also acknowledged the importance of congressional protection of rights. That Court showed a remarkable amount of restraint towards congressional power, especially when Congress used that power to protect rights of belonging, those rights that that promote an inclusive vision of who belongs to the national community and facilitate equal membership in that community.

This article has implications for the political debate, in which supporters of rights of belonging often find ourselves championing courts as the protectors of those rights. It also sheds light on the ongoing debate among constitutional scholars over “popular constitutionalism,” in which skeptics argue that judicial review is necessary for the protection of minority rights. Both arguments are based on a misunderstanding of the historical relationship between courts, Congress and rights of belonging, and a misunderstanding of the Warren Court’s role in that history. Understanding the judicial restraint of the Warren Court will help to open up a necessary political debate over the scope and meaning of our rights of belonging.
In recent years, opposing “activist judges” has become something of a mantra for conservative politicians. Those on the political right most often use the term “judicial activism,” to refer to liberal judges striking down their legislation. At the same time, constitutional scholars have engaged in a parallel debate over the value of “popular constitutionalism,” that is, constitutional interpretation outside of the courts. Advocates of popular constitutionalism question the primacy of judicial review over constitutional interpretation by the political branches, while its critics maintain that judicial review is necessary for stable and principled constitutional interpretation. These debates raise the age-old question of the appropriate relationship between courts and legislatures with regard to individual rights. Critics of popular constitutionalism maintain that an active judiciary is necessary for the adequate protection of minority rights because equality norms need protection from majority rule, and with few exceptions even the staunchest proponents of popular constitutionalism agree. These scholars support judicial activism as a means of protecting minority rights.

The many “activist” rulings of the Warren Court expanding individual rights and the jurisdiction of federal courts are the paradigmatic example of courts protecting the rights of minorities. Indeed, in academia and in politics the Warren Court is still synonymous with judicial activism. However, a closer examination of the Warren Court’s legacy reveals that that Court’s approach to equality rights was considerably more complex than this paradigm suggests. There is another side to the Warren Court legacy – that Court’s deference towards congressional power. In a series of landmark decisions articulating its deference to Congress, the Warren Court invited and encouraged popular constitutionalism, enabling members of Congress to use their own judgment in defining and protecting minority rights. In this essay, I argue that the strongest contribution that the Warren Court made to expanding equality rights was not its judicial activism in protecting those rights, but its restraint in allowing Congress to protect those rights.

The Warren Court era saw a marked expansion of “rights of belonging,” those rights that promote an inclusive vision of who belongs to the national community and facilitate equal membership in that community. Based in equality, rights of belonging help to define and expand access to the community in which we live by removing barriers to participation in that community. Both critics and supporters of the Warren Court often attribute the expansion of these rights to that Court, whether condemning the Court

11 For example, civil rights legislation opens access to employment, education, and other opportunities, and the right to join a union empowers workers to participate in their workplace and in the political arena. In contrast, liberty interests, like the right to family autonomy and freedom of speech, in and of themselves are not rights of belonging. However, liberty-based rights can implicate equality-based rights. For example, the right to marry is a liberty interest, rooted in individual autonomy, but it becomes an equality interest when it is denied to one group of people based on immutable characteristics. See Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967). This article does not attempt to define all rights of belonging, nor would it be possible to do so. The focus of this article is on the process of definition – indeed, participating in defining rights of belonging is itself an act of belonging. See ZIETLOW, ENFORCING EQUALITY, supra note 5 at Ch. 8.
for illegitimately imposing its own will on the democratic process or praising the Justices of the Warren Court as “countermajoritarian heroes” protecting rights of minorities.\textsuperscript{12}

Yet while the Warren Court certainly was protective of rights of belonging, the Warren Court’s restraint towards Congress enabled that body to be equally protective of those rights. Indeed, from the 1964 Civil Rights Act to the 1994 Violence Against Women Act, Congress gave those rights \textit{more} protections than did federal courts.

Warren Court decisions such as Brown v. Board of Education\textsuperscript{13} provide support for the argument that judicial activism is necessary for the adequate protection of rights of belonging. Inspired by the Warren Court, many scholars have argued that an active judiciary is necessary for the adequate protection of minority rights.\textsuperscript{14} Yet the little known and understood truth is that throughout the history of our country, proponents of rights of belonging have been more successful with politics than with litigation.\textsuperscript{15}

Judicial restraint, not judicial activism, has always been necessary for the healthy development of rights of belonging in this country.\textsuperscript{16} Not only has the Court rarely acted to protect rights of belonging as the Warren Court did, but it has also rarely allowed congressional efforts to protect those rights.\textsuperscript{17} Understanding this, prior to the Warren Court Era progressives consistently advocated for judicial restraint, not judicial activism. Since the Warren Court era, the Supreme Court has returned to its activist ways in its relationship to Congress, striking down congressional efforts to define and protect rights of belonging.\textsuperscript{18}

In contrast to the Warren Court’s deference to congressional power, the Rehnquist Court was considerably more “activist” in its approach to that coordinate body. The Rehnquist Court struck down a record 33 acts of Congress from 1995 to 2003, compared to only 17 during the most activist period of the Warren Court.\textsuperscript{19} Moreover, while the Warren Court invalidated only federal statutes “of little or no significance,”\textsuperscript{20} many of the federal statutes invalidated by the Rehnquist Court enjoyed strong bi-partisan support.\textsuperscript{21} Most importantly, while the Warren Court was most deferential to Congress’ power to define and protect rights of belonging, the Rehnquist Court imposed its most rigorous scrutiny on such statutes.\textsuperscript{22} Yet, as the Warren Court understood, when minorities win in \textsuperscript{17} Indeed, what most distinguishes the Warren Court may be the extent to which the political process largely coincided with that particular Court’s value preferences. See generally Powe, supra note 3. I owe this thought to an e-mail from Michelle Adams, on file with the author.

\textsuperscript{19} According to Thomas Keck, that period extended from 1962 to 1969. See Keck, supra note 2 at 40 (2004). During that eight year period, the Court struck down an average of 3.67 federal statutes per year, more than double the average of the Warren Court. The Earlier Rehnquist Court was considerably less activist, striking down only 7 federal statutes from 1986-1994, an average of 0.78, making a total average of 2.35 per year. The Warren Court struck down an average of 1.64 federal statutes per year over its entire tenure, with an average of 2.29 per year during its most activist period, 1963-1969. Id. It is possible that the Rehnquist Court simply had more opportunities to strike down federal statutes because there were simply more federal laws to strike down. See Anna Harvey & Barry Friedman, Pulling Punches: Congressional Constraints on the Supreme Courts’ Constitutional Rulings 1987-2000, 31 Leg. Studies Q. 533 (2006), e-mail from Michael Solimine (on file with the author).

\textsuperscript{21} See Mark A. Graber, Constructing Judicial Review, Annu. Rev. Pol. Sci. 2005, 8:425-451, 444. The most notable example is the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, invalidated in City of Boerne v. Flores, which was approved virtually unanimously; See Zietlow, Enforcing Equality, supra note 5 at 2-5.

\textsuperscript{22} The Rehnquist Court applied heightened scrutiny to commerce clause based civil rights legislation in U.S. v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000); and a strict scrutiny like “congruence and proportionality” test to the political process, those victories are entitled to the maximum amount of deference by the countermajoritarian courts.

Underlying the debate over judicial activism is the question of what role values should play in shaping the law, and which branch is best suited to determine those values.
Responding to “activist” decisions striking down restrictions on abortion and gay marriage, political conservatives argue that unaccountable judges should not be allowed to shape our values.23 Put on the defensive, supporters of rights of belonging find ourselves reflexively defending courts as protectors of our values.24 Yet that approach is not only counter-historical, there are strong institutional and policy reasons why confining debates over values to the judicial process may have a harmful effect on rights of belonging. Legislation creating rights of belonging is likely to be more effective than court rulings expanding those rights because the transparency and accountability of the political process are more likely to foster popular acceptance. Rights of belonging are more likely to flourish if they are part of the ongoing political dialogue over values in our society. For those who have historically lacked power in our society, participation in the political process itself is also an act of belonging. An open dialogue about the meaning and extent of rights of belonging is healthy for our civic society because it provides a mechanism for dialogue about our fundamental values. Judicial activism creates the danger of stifling that debate. Thus, judicial restraint, and not judicial activism, is likely to foster the most robust rights of belonging.

Section II of this article discusses the terms of the debate, defining judicial activism and explaining its historical relationship to rights of belonging. Section III summarizes the activism of the Warren Court in protecting individual rights, and Section IV correspondingly illustrates that Court’s restraint when Congress acted to protect those rights. Section V contrasts the activism of the Rehnquist Court in restricting congressional autonomy to protect rights of belonging to the restraint of the Warren Court. Finally, Section VI discusses the institutional reasons behind the importance of congressional autonomy to protect rights of belonging. The Rehnquist Court’s activism has led many constitutional law scholars to reconsider their position on judicial review. Those of us who support the expansion of rights of belonging should advocate judicial restraint.

II. Judicial Activism and Rights of Belonging

In today’s political debate, the term “judicial activism” has become so overused as to be practically meaningless. Politicians and pundits seem to invoke the term whenever they disagree with a court’s decision. Hence, it is important to define the 26 Compare, e.g., Mark Tushnet, Taking the Constitution Away from the Courts 154-176 (1999) (arguing against judicial review); Larry D. Kramer, Popular Constitutionalism, Circa 2004, 92 Cal. L. Rev. 959 (2004) (supporting the concept of “popular constitutionalism” or constitutional interpretation outside of the courts) with Erwin Chemerinsky, In Defense of Judicial Review: A Reply to Professor Kramer, 92 Cal. L. Rev. 1013 (2004) (arguing that judicial review is necessary to protect minority rights); Robert Post and Reva Siegel, Popular Constitutionalism, Departmentalism, and Judicial Supremacy, 92 Cal. L. Rev. 1027, 1038 (2004) (“Yet to allow the political judgment of the Constitution to dictate constitutional law is to risk undermining the stability and reliability of the very constitutional rights that may express and protect our values.”).

28 Probably the most ironic use of the term was when members of Congress accused the federal courts of judicial activism for failing to hear the appeal of Terri Schiavo’s parents from the state court decision to term at the outset. Black’s Law Dictionary defines “judicial activism” as “A philosophy of judicial decision-making whereby judges allow their personal views about public policy, among other factors, to guide their decisions, usually with the suggestion that adherents of this philosophy tend to find constitutional violations and are willing to ignore precedent.” As Ernest Young recently observed, “judicial activism” “involve(s) a refusal by the court deciding a particular case to defer to other sorts of authority at the expense of its own judgment about the correct legal outcome.” While these definitions suggest that there are a variety of judicial practices that may amount to “judicial activism,” my primary focus is on the relationship between courts and legislatures, and in particular, on the relationship between the Supreme Court and Congress.

While judicial activism is problematic because the Court intrudes on the democratic process, proponents of rights of belonging often argue that activism is necessary to protect minorities against that process. Yet the widely held view of courts as protectors of minorities is a relatively recent phenomenon. With the exception of the Warren Court, throughout our history activist courts have been considerably more likely to rule against rights of belonging, not to uphold them. Legislatures, not courts, have historically provided the most protection for those rights.

A. The Terms of the Debate

Put simply, legislatures are elected by the people and therefore accountable to the people for their policy decisions. Federal judges are not elected, and their lifetime job allow doctors to terminate life sustaining measures. See Edward A. Hartnett, Congress Clears its Throat, 22 CONST. COMMENTARY 553, 555 (“For some, the term “judicial activism” is an empty epithet, meaning little more than that the one who hurls the term disagrees with a particular decision or line of decisions.”) 29 Black’s Law Dictionary (8th Ed. 2004). See also Young, supra note 19 at 1144. 30 Young, supra note 22 at 1145. 31 See, e.g., Chemerinsky, supra note 19 at 1014.

protection makes them less accountable to the people. Recently political scientists have suggested that this account is overly simplistic because “judicial review is established and maintained by elected officials.” Nevertheless, whenever a judge overrules the decision of a legislature, he or she potentially subjects herself to charges of judicial activism. As Alexander Bickel, a long time critic of the Warren Court, described it, the “counter-majoritarian difficulty” potentially undermines the legitimacy of federal courts when they second guess legislatures. Moreover, when the Supreme Court overturns an act of Congress, a co-equal branch, that action raises the additional concern about the proper balance of powers between the federal judiciary and the legislature.

Because the federal government is one of limited powers, there are two types of Supreme Court decisions striking down federal legislation – those decisions finding the legislation beyond the inherent, or internal limits of Congress, and those holding that the legislation violates some external constitutional limit. In the first group, the Court holds that Congress lacked the power to legislate to begin with, what amounts to a facial invalidation of a statute. In the second group, the Court may find that although Congress had the inherent power to legislate, a particular application of the law violates another provision of the Constitution. While both types of decisions are arguably examples of judicial activism, the first group is more problematic.

32 Graber, supra note 15 at 427.
33 See BICKEL, supra note 6 at 16-23; Young, supra note 19 at 1145. It is debatable whether courts actually behave in a countermajoritarian fashion. See, e.g., Robert A. Dahl, Decision-making in a Democracy: The Supreme Court as a National Policymaker, 50 Emory L.J. 563 (2001); Barry Friedman, Mediated Popular Constitutionalism, 101 Mich. L. Rev. 2596 (2003); Klarman, supra note 5. Nonetheless, the fact remains that political officials are elected by the people, and judges are not.
34 For example, the Court may find that a statute falls beyond Congress’ Commerce Power. See, e.g., U.S. v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000).
35 For example, the Court may find that a criminal law violates the Fifth Amendment, see, e.g., United States v. Romano, 382 U.S. 136, 138 (1965) or that a federal statute unconstitutionally “commandeers” a state legislature in violation of the 10th Amendment, See N.Y. v. U.S.
Whenever the Court holds that a federal statute is beyond the inherent powers of Congress, it is second-guessing Congress’ determination that the statute was constitutional, and correspondingly expanding the power of the Court at the expense of Congress.\(^{36}\) While both types of rulings involve the exercise of judicial review, arguably only the first group entails an assertion of judicial supremacy\(^ {37}\) because the Court is second-guessing the presumed judgment of members of Congress that they had the constitutional power to act. Courts are better suited for the second type of determination, considering the constitutionality of a particular application of a statute, since applying the law to a particular set of facts is what courts are best qualified to do. While either type of ruling enables courts to indulge in policy preferences and limit the means used by Congress, only the first type completely disables Congress from pursuing the ends that members of that body want to achieve.\(^ {38}\)

The flip side of judicial activism is “judicial restraint.” “Restrained” judges defer to the expertise of the political branches. As Thomas Keck observes, “if judicial restraint means anything in the context of the long conservative critique of the Warren Court and its legacy, it must mean a relative unwillingness to declare constitutional limitations on government.”\(^ {39}\) Judges exercising judicial restraint will be hesitant to overturn decisions made by the political branches because they are cognizant of their institutional limitations, including their lack of accountability.\(^ {40}\) Restrained judges recognize the institutional advantages of the political branches when they create law, and respect their authority to do so. Judicial restraint is thus “rooted in a majoritarian conception of American democracy.”©⁴¹ Hence, judges should use judicial restraint whenever possible.©⁴²

Of course, this discussion of judicial activism and restraint is arguably beside the point to those who are most concerned about rights of minorities. Sure, they argue, ideally both courts and Congress act to protect rights of belonging,©⁴³ and proponents of those rights should only resort to courts when they fail in the political process. But sometimes it is necessary for judges to intervene in that process in order to insure that it works, and often this intervention is needed on behalf of minorities.©⁴⁴ However, while this theory makes sense in the abstract, it is not borne out by our history.©⁴⁵ Minorities often lose in courts, and they tend to win in the political process far more often than this standard paradigm suggests. More importantly, when minorities win and convince legislatures to create rights of belonging, those victories should be entitled to the maximum amount of deference. Yet with the exception of the Warren Court, activist courts have often refused to defer to the legislative victories of minorities.

B. Judicial Activism’s Impact on Congress’ Enduring Role as a Protector of Rights of Belonging

©⁴² The standard response to my call for judicial restraint is that when the Court strikes down a legislative act, it acts with the authority to enforce the people’s will embodied in the Constitution. See Young, supra note 19 at 1146, citing, e.g., ELY, supra note 9 at 8-9. However, this argument is less persuasive when one considers that Congress is also interpreting the constitution when it legislates, especially when it legislates to protect fundamental rights like rights of belonging. See generally KEITH WHITTINGTON, CONSTITUTIONAL CONSTRUCTION; ZIELOW, ENFORCING EQUALITY, supra note 5, Ch. 1.
©⁴⁴ See Carolene Products footnote 4, ELY, supra note 9.
Ever since Reconstruction, members of Congress have acted repeatedly to protect rights of belonging, playing a leading role in historical periods marked by great expansions of rights of belonging, including Reconstruction, the New Deal, and the Second Reconstruction of the 1960s. Congress’ rights-generating role is mandated by the Constitution, enshrined not only in the enforcement clauses of the Reconstruction Amendments, but in every single subsequent constitutional amendment that expands individual rights. However, the Supreme Court has often responded negatively to congressional efforts to protect rights of belonging, narrowly reading congressional power to protect those rights and restricting the scope of such legislation. Historically, what is at stake in the debate over judicial activism is not just the proper relationship between courts and legislatures, but the scope of our rights to belong to the national community.

1. Reconstruction

Members of the Reconstruction Congress enacted the 13th, 14th and 15th Amendments to end slavery and protect the rights of freed slaves and other persons

46 Of course, Congress has also often remained inactive in the face of societal injustice. The most notable example of this inaction is Congress’ failure to enact legislation to address race discrimination in the Jim Crow Era from the end of Reconstruction until the late 1950s. For a detailed discussion of this period, see MICHAEL KLARMAN, FROM JIM CROW TO CIVIL RIGHTS (2004). For an in-depth discussion of congressional action and inaction during this period, see ZIETLOW, ENFORCING EQUALITY, supra note 5 at Chapters 3-6.

48 See U.S.CONST. Amends. XIII (abolishing slavery and giving Congress the power to “enforce this article by appropriate legislation”); XIV; XV (prohibiting the federal government and states from denying the right to vote on account of race and giving Congress the power to “enforce this article by appropriate legislation”); XIX (prohibiting the denial of the right to vote on account of sex and giving Congress the power to “enforce this article by appropriate legislation”); XXIII (bestowing the right to vote for president on residents of the District of Columbia and giving Congress the power to “enforce this article by appropriate legislation”); XXIV (prohibiting the use of poll taxes as a voting qualification and giving Congress the power to “enforce this article by appropriate legislation”); XXVI (lowering the voting age to eighteen and giving Congress the power to “enforce this article by appropriate legislation”).

49 Indeed, it is the Warren Court’s deference to congressional power to protect rights of belonging, and not the Rehnquist Court’s activism against that power, that is the historical anomaly.
within their jurisdiction. All of these amendments contained enforcement provisions empowering Congress to protect those rights. The enforcement clauses marked a major constitutional change. Before them, there was no provision of the constitution that empowered Congress to protect rights of belonging, or any other individual rights. Indeed, empowering Congress to protect rights of belonging was central to the mission of the 39th Congress and the raison d’etre of the Fourteenth Amendment. Members of the Reconstruction Congress viewed the Supreme Court as an agent of the Slave Power. The pro-slavery Dred Scott decision, not the anti-segregation Brown v. Board of Education, was their model of the Court’s treatment of individual rights. Therefore, they saw themselves, and not the Court, as the primary enforcers of rights of belonging.

Along with the Reconstruction Amendments, these members of Congress enacted numerous statutes protecting rights of belonging, including civil rights statutes and massive social programs to facilitate Reconstruction. After the compromise of 1876, Democrats took control of Congress and the political body turned away from protecting rights of belonging. However, well before that date the Court had already restricted the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment in The Slaughter-House Cases, and in 1883, the 50 Notwithstanding this fact, the Supreme Court upheld two Fugitive Slave Acts as enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Clause and the property rights of slave owners. See Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 539 (1842); Ablemon v. Booth, 21 How. 526.

51 As John Bingham, the principal author of that Amendment, explained during the debate over the Amendment, “Sir, it has been the want of the Republic that there was not an express grant of power in the Constitution to enable the whole people of every state, by congressional enactment, to enforce obedience to these requirements of the Constitution.” CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 1033 (1866). The Warren Court recognized this, noting that “the Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment were primarily interested in augmenting the power of Congress, rather than the courts.” Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641, 648, fn. 7, citing JACOBUS TENBROEK, THE ANTISLAVERY ORIGINS OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT (1951) and Frantz, Congressional Power to Enforce the Fourteenth Amendment Against Private Acts, 73 YALE L. J. 1353, 1356-1357.

Court issued perhaps its most important decision restricting the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment, limiting Congress’ enforcement powers to remedying state action in The Civil Rights Cases.\textsuperscript{55} These decisions proved that members of the Reconstruction Congress had been right to distrust the Court.\textsuperscript{56}

2. The New Deal Era

It was not until the 1960s and the advent of the modern civil rights movement that Congress returned to protecting the rights of racial minorities. In the meantime, before and during the New Deal, Congress acted to protect the rights of belonging of workers and poor people. In the years leading up to the New Deal, workers had repeatedly gained rights in the legislative process only to have federal and state courts invalidate their gains as violating the common law “right to contract,” and enjoining their right to strike as intruding on their employers’ “property rights.”\textsuperscript{57} Rather than turning to the courts to enforce their rights, during this era, as during Reconstruction, reformers viewed courts as an obstacle to achieving social reforms. One of their principle legislative successes was the 1932 Norris-LaGuardia Act, which restricted federal jurisdiction over labor relations in order to stifle the judicial activism those courts were using against workers and their right to organize.\textsuperscript{58}

\textsuperscript{55} 109 U.S. 3 (1883). As Pamela Brandwein details, in these cases the Court adopted the view of the Democratic opponents of those measures in the Reconstruction Congress. See \textit{PAMELA BRANDWEIN, RECONSTRUCTING RECONSTRUCTION: THE SUPREME COURT AND THE PRODUCTION OF HISTORICAL TRUTH} 88 (1999).

\textsuperscript{56} The Reconstruction Congress did expand the jurisdiction of federal courts over civil rights matters in statutes such as 42 U.S.C. §1983 and 28 U.S.C. §1334. These statutes are best explained by the fact that these members of Congress distrusted state courts even more than federal courts, and because they wanted to make every possible avenue for the vindication of civil rights. See Xi Wang, \textit{The Making of Federal Enforcement Laws, 1870-1872}, 70 CHL-KENT L. REV. 1013 (1995).

During the time of the New Deal, Congress enacted the Wagner Act, creating a statutory right for workers to organize into a union and engage in collective bargaining with the Wagner Act, and protected other workers’ rights including the right to a minimum wage, and created an economic safety net.\(^{59}\) When enacting these measures, members of Congress championed a constitutional vision that centered on individual freedom and the ideology of social citizenship.\(^{60}\) After its flurry of activity during the New Deal, Congress was never as pro-labor again, enacting the pro-business Taft Hartley Act only 12 years later. As during Reconstruction, however, the Court was considerably more influential than Congress in restricting the scope of workers’ rights, upholding the Wagner Act but issuing numerous rulings reducing the effectiveness of its protections.\(^{61}\) Exercising popular constitutionalism, New Deal politicians, not judges, brought about the greatest expansion of rights of belonging since the Reconstruction Era, despite the judicial activism restricting the scope of those rights.

As a result of the Court’s history of restricting Congress’ power to protect rights of belonging, progressives in the first half of the twentieth century saw judicial activism as anathema. New Deal Era progressives on the Warren Court, such as Justices Hugo Black and Felix Frankfurter, became the leading opponents of that Court’s activism.\(^{62}\) While those opponents of judicial activism also would dissent in a number of “activist”

Warren Court cases, they also influenced the Warren Court as it issued numerous rulings exercising restraint and upholding congressional power to create new rights of belonging during the Second Reconstruction of the 1960s.

III. The Judicial Activism of the Warren Court

To be sure, in numerous cases, the Warren Court played an activist role by intervening in the political process. Perhaps the best known “activist” Warren Court case is one of its first, Brown v. Board of Education, in which the Court held that segregated elementary schools violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, overruling the precedent of Plessy v. Ferguson and challenging the segregationist way of life of millions of Americans. In a series of decisions following Brown, the Court struck down state sponsored segregation in other state run facilities, contributing to the eventual dismantling of the Jim Crow system in the South. Throughout the Warren Court era, the Court often ruled in favor of civil rights and civil liberties, interpreting those civil rights and liberties expansively at the expense of legislatures, ordering the reconfiguration of legislative districts, incorporating the Bill of Rights against the states via the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and expanding federal jurisdiction to facilitate the vindication of those rights in federal courts. This activism subjected the Warren Court to virulent criticism from academics and politicians alike. It also made the Warren Court a heroic icon for an entire generation of lawyers and academics, and many of their subsequent students.71

A. The Warren Court’s Activism

In the Warren Court’s early years, its activism was largely limited to expanding its mandate in Brown to other government facilities and upholding the First Amendment rights of public employees accused of supporting communism.72 The Warren Court also expanded the reach of the First Amendment on behalf of civil rights activists with its landmark ruling in *NY Times v. Sullivan.*73 The Warren Court interpreted federal rights expansively, especially those of criminal defendants, reinvigorated the Equal Protection Clause and identified new fundamental rights such as the right to vote and the right to privacy.74 In another series of decisions, the Warren Court interpreted the Fourteenth Amendment to incorporate virtually the entire Bill of Rights against state governments.75 All of these decisions reflected the Warren Court’s confidence that federal courts could competently determine the scope of individual rights, even when doing so arguably injected those courts into the realm of public policy.

Other Warren Court decisions seem at first glance to reflect a distrust of the political process. The Warren Court also enhanced the power of the federal courts,

Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964) (incorporating the Fifth Amendment right of freedom from self incrimination); Klopfer v. among other things articulating expansive tests for private rights of action, narrowly reading the political question doctrine and standing limitations, and engaging the federal courts in remedying the segregation of public schools. In Reynolds v. Sims, the Court established the “one person one vote” rule, putting into question the legitimacy of 90% of congressional districts and virtually all seats in state legislatures. Because of their impact on the political process, the reapportionment cases - Sims and its progeny – are arguably the most activist cases of the Warren Court. The reapportionment decisions reflect a distrust of the electoral process, especially that process in southern states, and lend support to the view that “the [Warren Court] justices simply did not share the scholar’s faith in the democratic character of ordinary politics.”

The Warren Court’s activist decisions have been cause for both vilification and celebration. However, both opponents and supporters of the Warren Court tend to leave out that Court’s legacy of restraint and respect for the legislative, especially when it that process was used as a means of popular constitutionalism.

B. Criticism of the Warren Court’s Activism

From the outset, the Warren Court had its critics in both academia and the political process. Many of the Court’s critics argued that the Court had exceeded its proper role within the system of separation of powers. For example, in 1958, the well-respected Judge Learned Hand gave a series of lectures at Harvard Law School in which he famously accused the Court of acting as if they were “Platonic guardians.”

Similarly, Herbert Wechsler criticized the Court’s reasoning in Brown because he felt it could not be justified by “neutral principles.” In numerous works, Alexander Bickel criticized the Court for making not law, but public policy. Probably the most virulent critics of the Court in academia was Philip Kurland. For example, in a 1964 Harvard Law Review article, Kurland accused the Warren Court of being dogmatic, results oriented, and even disingenuous.

Criticism of the Warren Court also was common in the political realm. In 1956, southern members of Congress adopted the “Southern Manifesto,” which charged that the Court’s decision in Brown v. Board of Education was “a clear abuse of judicial power [that] climaxes a trend in the Federal judiciary undertaking to legislate, in derogation of the authority of Congress, and to encroach upon the reserved rights of the states and the people.” Richard Nixon made his opposition to the Warren Court a central feature of his successful run for president in 1968.

In Congress, critics of the Court accused it of being pro-communist, undermining the states, and of being incompetent. Jurisdiction stripping measures were proposed several times in response to the Court’s decision upholding the First Amendment rights of those accused of supporting communism and imposing re-districting on the states.

The Court’s rulings striking down prayer in schools inspired some members of Congress to call for impeachment.\(^{90}\) Indeed, “Impeach Earl Warren” signs were ubiquitous throughout the South during Warren’s tenure.\(^{91}\)

None of the jurisdiction stripping measures succeeded. Instead, Congress expanded federal jurisdiction in statutes such as the 1964 Civil Rights Act and the 1965 Voting Rights Act, indicating support for the Court’s efforts. Nonetheless, political charges of judicial activism permeated the entire Warren Court era.\(^{92}\)

C. Praise of the Warren Court’s Activism

Critics of the Warren Court are not the only ones who view the Court as a paradigm of the activist Court. Many supporters of the Court extol precisely its activism, exhibiting what Laura Kalman calls a “religious and mystical” view of the Warren Court.\(^{93}\) For example, one of the Court’s most ardent supporters, Owen Fiss, claims that although the Court drew on social movements and responded to historical circumstances, “The truth of the matter is that it was the Warren Court that spurred the great changes to follow, and inspired and protected those who sought to implement them.”\(^{94}\) To Fiss and other supporters of the Warren Court, the Court was heroically anti-majoritarian, championing the rights of minorities in opposition to the political bodies.\(^{95}\) scholars have argued that this view of the Warren Court is ahistorical because the Warren Court’s rulings largely tracked the politics of the era. Yet the view of the Warren Court as the “quintessentially activist” Court persists both inside and outside the academic arena.

The widespread view of the Warren Court as an activist champion of minority rights against majoritarian tyranny is understandable given the fact that most constitutional scholars either grew up during the Warren Court Era, or were taught by constitutional law professors who grew up during that era. As Jack Balkin and Sandy Levinson have observed, to those scholars, “the philosophy of judicial restraint [championed by New Deal progressives] now seemed to justify the Court’s decades-long collaboration with Jim Crow” prior to the Court’s decision in Brown. Though the New Dealers had championed judicial restraint to end the Lochner Era, by 1964, “judicial restraint” was no longer the call of progressives, but that of conservatives “satisfied to continue collaborating with manifest injustice.” However, championing the Justices on the Warren Court as anti-majoritarian activists unduly discounts what is perhaps the most important legacy of the Warren Court – not its activism, but its restraint.

IV. The Judicial Restraint of the Warren Court

Notwithstanding the Warren Court’s scrutiny of the electoral process in its reapportionment cases, when it came to evaluating the actions of elected representatives, the Warren Court exhibited a markedly deferential view of politics. The Court applied a baseline of rational basis review to all legislation, both state and federal, including that protecting rights of belonging. The Warren Court’s opinions evaluating economic legislation and the powers of Congress are familiar to any first year constitutional law student. Nevertheless, their import seems lost on the vast majority of observers who characterize the Warren Court as rejecting political pluralism.\(^99\) To the contrary, those decisions illustrate the fact that in general, the Warren Court assumed that the process of legislative deliberation worked.

During a period of 15 years, the Warren Court struck down only 23 federal statutes,\(^100\) and in none of those cases did the Court find that a statute exceeded the inherent power of Congress.\(^101\) Instead, the Court struck down federal statutes for the same reason it struck down state statutes – because they violated individual rights.\(^102\) Throughout its fifteen-year term, the Warren Court gave Congress broad autonomy to legislate. Many Warren Court decisions reflect that Court’s respect for the legislative process, especially when Congress used that process to protect rights of belonging. The decisions allowed supporters of rights of belonging and their representatives in Congress to engage in popular constitutionalism on behalf of those rights.

A. Baseline – Rational Basis Review

\(^101\) The only case that arguably limited the inherent power of Congress was Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957), in which the Court held that Congress could not use its treaty power to violate individual constitutional rights. Id. at 19-23. However, Reid is better understood as simply imposing external limitations on the treaty power, and is thus consistent with the other Warren Court cases that invalidated federal statutes solely on the grounds that they violated individual rights. See Appendix A.

\(^102\) See Appendix A.
In the economic realm, members of the Warren Court followed in the footsteps of their late New Deal predecessors, who had repudiated the Lochner Era of active judicial intervention that characterized the first third of the Twentieth Century. During the Lochner Era, courts had viewed economic regulation as inherently suspect and carefully scrutinized both the legislative means and ends. After President Roosevelt attacked this interventionist approach, the Supreme Court changed its mind and relaxed its scrutiny. In cases such as U.S. Carolene Products,\textsuperscript{103} the late New Deal Court indicated that economic legislation would enjoy a new presumption of legitimacy whether or not members of the Court approved of it. While most of these cases involved state legislation, the rational basis baseline also provided ample room for Congress to act.

In Carolene Products, the late New Deal Court applied rational basis review to a federal law barring the sale of “filled” milk and deferred to congressional fact-finding supporting the statute.\textsuperscript{104} In his famous footnote four, Justice Stone suggested that the Court would apply a higher level of scrutiny to legislation that infringed on fundamental rights, restricted the political process, or affected “discrete and insular minorities.” Scholars have argued persuasively that the Warren Court’s approach to judicial review was guided by footnote four’s focus on improving the political process and protecting racial minorities.\textsuperscript{105} While some have questioned whether footnote four of Carolene Products actually influenced the Warren Court,\textsuperscript{106} the body of the opinion clearly provided a blueprint for that Court. In its opinions evaluating economic legislation, the Warren Court consistently applied a hands-off approach that reflected an underlying respect for the legislative process.

An early Warren Court case, Williamson v. Lee Optical, illustrates this point. In that case, the Court upheld the constitutionality of an Oklahoma statute that made it unlawful for a person not a licensed optometrist or opthamologist to fit lenses to a face or duplicate or replace lenses into frames except upon a written prescription.\(^{107}\) In an opinion written by Justice William Douglas, the Court agreed that the provision “may exact a needless, wasteful requirement in many cases.”\(^{108}\) However, Douglas continued, “it is for the legislature, not the courts, to balance the advantages and disadvantages of the new requirement.”\(^{109}\) The Court concluded, “For protection against abuses by legislatures the people must resort to the polls, not to the courts.”\(^{110}\) The Warren Court thus reaffirmed the deferential baseline for evaluating legislation from Carolene Products. Absent evidence of invidious discrimination, the Court would assume that the political process worked.\(^{111}\)

In Ferguson v. Skrupa, The Warren Court appeared to be even more deferential to legislatures, rejecting a challenge to a Kansas statute that made it a misdemeanor for any person to engage “in the business of ‘debt adjusting’ except as an incident to ‘the lawful practice of law in the state.’”\(^{112}\) Skrupa, a debt adjuster who was not a lawyer, argued that the state could not prohibit him from practicing his profession because it was neither inherently immoral nor dangerous, nor in any way contrary to the public welfare.\textsuperscript{113} The Court declined to comment on the merits of this argument, explaining: “Under the system of government created by our Constitution, it is up to legislatures, not courts, to decide on the wisdom and utility of legislation. . . Unquestionably, there are arguments showing that the business of debt adjusting has social utility, but such arguments are properly addressed to the legislature, not to us.”\textsuperscript{114} Once again, absent evidence of invidious discrimination, the Court deferred to the fact-finding capability of the legislature and assumed that the political process worked.

The Court also rejected challenges to those provisions.

B. Commerce Clause

The legacy of the late New Deal Court is also reflected in the Warren Court’s approach to the Commerce Clause, the principal source of congressional regulatory power. Just as it had in the area of substantive due process, the Court had applied heightened scrutiny to strike down early New Deal commerce clause based measures such as the National Industrial Relations Act.\textsuperscript{115} Indeed, it was President Roosevelt’s frustration with those decisions that led him to attack the Court and recommend his Court packing plan.\textsuperscript{116} Shortly thereafter, the Court adopted a deferential approach to uphold important measures such as the National Labor Relations Act,\textsuperscript{117} the Fair Labor Standards Act,\textsuperscript{118} and the Agricultural Adjustment Act.\textsuperscript{119} The Warren Court relied on those authority to address private discrimination. Thus, since 1964 commerce clause based legislation has played a crucial role in shaping our nation’s civil rights agenda.\textsuperscript{120}

The 1964 Civil Rights Act was a landmark measure that outlawed race discrimination in places of public accommodation, employment and education.\textsuperscript{121} The measure was based in Congress’ power to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment and the Commerce Clause. In Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States, the Court upheld Title II of the Act, the public accommodations provision, based on Congress’ power to regulate interstate commerce.\textsuperscript{122} Justice Clark applied a relaxed form of rational basis review to the Commerce Clause, calling the commerce power “a specific and plenary one” that Congress could use as long as “the activity sought to be regulated is ‘commerce which concerns more states than one.’”\textsuperscript{123} Noting the “voluminous testimony” about the impact of race discrimination on the travel and other economic activity of African Americans,\textsuperscript{124} the Court held that the Act was a valid use of the commerce power even thought it was aimed primarily at “moral wrongs.”\textsuperscript{125} Thus, the Court deferred to Congress’ choice of means as well as its choice of ends. \textsuperscript{126}

In the companion case, Katzenbach v. McClung, the Court upheld the application of the Act to a restaurant located in Birmingham, Alabama.\(^\text{127}\) Although the restaurant’s connection to interstate commerce was considerably more attenuated than that of the motel, the Court found that the restaurant’s purchases of food that had moved in interstate commerce, and the aggregate effect of African Americans reducing their spending due to racial discrimination like that practiced by the restaurant, was a sufficient nexus to interstate commerce to rationally justify Congress’ power to regulate.\(^\text{128}\) The Court noted, “where we find that legislators, in light of the facts and testimony before them, have a rational basis for finding a chosen regulatory scheme necessary to the protection of commerce, our investigation is at an end.”\(^\text{129}\) Characterizing Congress’ commerce power as “broad and sweeping,” the Court all but abdicated its role in scrutinizing the commerce power. “Where (Congress) keeps within its sphere and violates no express constitutional limitation it has been the rule of this Court, going back almost to the founding days of the Republic, not to interfere.”\(^\text{130}\)

C. Section Five

Given the Warren Court’s positive disposition toward rights of belonging and the civil rights movement, perhaps it is not surprising that the Court displayed the most deference toward Congress when evaluating civil rights measures enacted pursuant to the enforcement provisions of the Reconstruction Amendments. Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment grants Congress the power to enforce its provisions by \(^{128}\) Id. at 298.

\(^{129}\) Id. at 303-304.
\(^{130}\) Id. at 305. Five years later, in one of the last Warren Court opinions, the Court went even further and upheld application of the Act to recreation club located in the mountains near Little Rock, Arkansas, accessible only by country roads. See Daniel v. Paul, 395 U.S. 298 (1969).
“appropriate legislation.” Recognizing that members of the Reconstruction Congress saw themselves, and not the Court, as the primary enforcers of rights of belonging, the Warren Court interpreted these enforcement powers broadly. As in its other opinions evaluating congressional power, the Court applied rational basis to Section Five-based legislation. Moreover, passages of its opinions on Section Five power indicate deference not only to congressional remedial power, but arguably also to congressional autonomy to interpret the substance of the Constitution.

In South Carolina v. Katzenbach, the Court upheld the constitutionality of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Like the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the 1965 Voting Rights Act was a response to massive civil rights demonstrations protesting the denial of the franchise in the South, and was intended to enable the belonging of racial minorities to the national polity. The main focus of the Act was to outlaw literacy tests, which had been used in a racially discriminatory manner throughout the South. The Act created a complex scheme of remedies aimed at districts where voting discrimination was most likely to have occurred. For example, it prohibited the use of literacy tests in districts where the Attorney General determines that fewer than 50% of its residents are registered to vote, and authorized the appointment of federal electoral examiners in those districts.

131 U.S. CONST. AMEND XIV, §5. The Fifteenth Amendment, which prohibits the denial of the franchise on account of race, contains a virtually identical enforcement clause, U.S. AMEND. XV, §2, and the Court treats the two clauses interchangeably.

J. 1, 36 (hereinafter, “Protecting”) (“Katzenbach applied to Section 5 power the same standards of deference that the post-New Deal Court has applied to every other grant of congressional authority”).

134 Id. at 34 (“Evidently the Warren Court saw nothing contradictory in simultaneously upholding the rule of law and deferring to Congress’ Section 5 authority.”)

136 President Johnson introduced the Voting Rights Act only a week after the violence of the voting rights march in Selma, Alabama, was televised nationally, and a Gallup Poll showed that 50% of Americans felt that the most important issue in the country was civil rights. POWE, supra note 3 at 257.
districts. The blanket prohibition of literacy tests was arguably inconsistent with the Court’s earlier ruling in Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections, that literacy tests are not per se unconstitutional, because the statute did not require a finding of intentional discrimination before the tests would be outlawed. South Carolina argued that to allow Congress to enact such a bill would rob the courts of their rightful constitutional role, but the Court disagreed.

In the majority opinion, Chief Justice Earl Warren noted that the Framers had intended Congress to be “chiefly responsible for implementing the rights created in Section One.” Thus, he concluded, “in addition to the courts, Congress has full remedial powers to effectuate the constitutional prohibition against racial discrimination in voting.” The only question was whether the legislation was a rational means to effectuate this constitutional prohibition. Warren cited McCulloch v. Maryland to explain the Court’s use of rational basis, noting that McCulloch’s broad vision of congressional power was “the basic test . . . in all cases concerning the express powers of Congress with relation to the reserved powers of the states.” Applying rational basis, the Court had no trouble upholding Section 4(b) of the 1965 Voting Rights Act. Even in Lassiter the Court had allowed that literacy tests used with a discriminatory purpose would violate the Fifteenth Amendment. Hence, the Court deferred to Congress’ findings that literacy tests had in all likelihood been used with a discriminatory purpose in the states most affected by the statute.\textsuperscript{143} This was a relatively easy case.\textsuperscript{144}

Katzenbach v. Morgan was a considerably more difficult case.\textsuperscript{145} In Morgan, the Court evaluated the constitutionality of §4(e) of the Voting Rights Act, which provided that no person who has successfully completed the sixth grade in a public school accredited by the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico in which the language of instruction was other than English could be denied the right to vote on account of his or her failure to read English.\textsuperscript{146} No court had ever held that New York State officials had used the literacy tests to discriminate on the basis of race, yet Congress relied on its Section Five power to enact this provision. Hence, the case raised the issue that the Court had skirted in the South Carolina case – to what extent did Congress have the autonomous authority to identify constitutional violations?

In his majority opinion, Justice William Brennan answered this question. He allowed Congress a great deal of autonomy to identify constitutional violations because “[a] construction of Section Five that would require a judicial determination that the enforcement of a state law precluded by Congress violated the Amendment, as a condition of sustaining the congressional enactment, would depreciate both congressional resourcefulness and congressional responsibility for implementing the amendment.”\textsuperscript{147}

Noting that Section Five was intended to give Congress the “same broad powers

\textsuperscript{146} Voting Rights Act of 1965, §4(e), 42 U.S.C. §1973b(e). The provision was sponsored by New York Senators Jacob Javits and Robert Kennedy, and it was intended to supercede a New York state law which required the ability to read and write in English as a condition of voting. expressed in the Necessary and Proper Clause,” the Court again cited McCulloch.\textsuperscript{148} The Court held that §4(e) could easily be seen as “readily adapted” to enforcing the Equal Protection Clause both as a measure to secure non-discriminatory treatment by the government and as a measure to enhance the political power of the Puerto Rican community to obtain better government services.\textsuperscript{149}

The Court deferred to the fact-finding capabilities of Congress in weighing the extent of the Puerto Rican community’s need for the measure. “It is not for us to review the congressional resolution of these factors. It is enough that we be able to perceive a basis upon which the Congress might resolve this conflict as it did.”\textsuperscript{150} The Court also deferred to Congress’ assessment of the relationship between literacy in English and the ability to cast an informed vote. Citing Congress’ “specially informed legislative competence,” Brennan noted that “it was Congress’ prerogative to weigh these competing considerations” and overrule the state’s determination that literacy in English was necessary.\textsuperscript{151} Here, the Court applied the same deferential rational basis review to Section Five as it had to the commerce power in \textit{Heart of Atlanta Motel}. The Court’s approach in \textit{Morgan} was even farther reaching, because the Court appeared to defer to congressional judgment about the meaning of the constitution.\textsuperscript{152}

The \textit{Morgan} case was a landmark decision, and arguably an invitation for Congress to interpret the 14\textsuperscript{th} Amendment as broadly, and protectively, as members of Congress saw fit, regardless of the Court’s interpretation of Section One. Former

See Post & Siegel, Protecting, supra note 102 at 35, n. 153. Under the deferential watch of the Warren Court, however, the distinction was trivial. Solicitor General Archibald Cox certainly understood the decisions in that way. Writing in early 1966, Cox declared, “If the Congress follows the lead that the Court has provided, the last Term’s opinions interpreting Section 5 will prove as important in bespeaking national legislative authority to promote human rights as the Labor Board decisions of 1937 were in providing national authority to regulate the economy.”\(^{153}\)

Citing contemporary political theory that recognized the existence of positive rights, such as the right to jobs, medical care, social security and housing, Cox noted, “Once government is held to have affirmative obligations to promote human rights much of the responsibility must shift to the legislative and executive branches.”\(^{154}\) He believed that the Morgan decision would allow Congress to do just that. Most importantly, opined Cox, Congress might be able to use its Section Five power to remedy private discrimination, notwithstanding the Court’s doctrine restricting the scope of Section One to state action.\(^{155}\)

Six members of the Court said as much that same year in their concurrences to the Court’s opinion in United States v. Guest.\(^{156}\) In Guest, several private individuals were indicted for depriving African Americans of the use of state supported services, in violation of 18 U.S.C. 241, a civil rights statute that dated back to the 1866 Civil Rights Act. A plurality of the Court held that §241 only applied to state action but that the facts supported a finding of state action. In two concurrences, six of the Justices agreed that Congress could use Section Five to address private action even though the scope of Section One was limited to state action.\textsuperscript{157}

Speaking for a concurrence of three Justices that held that §241 did reach private discrimination but as such was constitutional, Justice Brennan rejected the argument that Congress’s Section Five power was limited by the Court’s earlier holding that Section One only applied to state action,\textsuperscript{158} protesting that such a view “reduces the legislative power to enforce the provisions of the Amendment to that of the judiciary.”\textsuperscript{159} He explained, “Viewed in its proper perspective, Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment appears as a positive grant of legislative power, authorizing Congress to exercise its discretion in fashioning remedies to achieve civil and political equality for all citizens.”\textsuperscript{160} In a short concurrence with little explanation, Justices Clark, Black and Fortas agreed with the plurality that §241 did not address state action, but added without explanation, “there can now be no doubt that the specific language of Section Five empowers the Congress to enact laws punishing all conspiracies – with or without state action – that interfere with Fourteenth Amendment rights.”\textsuperscript{161} These opinions supported Cox’s argument that Congress could use Section Five to do away with the state action requirement regardless of how the Court interpreted Section One, suggesting that Congress had wide autonomy to address private discrimination.\textsuperscript{162}

See also Post & Siegel, Equal Protection, supra note 2 at 501, (arguing that in Guest, “Through a combination of interpretive strategems, the Court decisively freed federal anti-discrimination legislation from the state action requirements it preserved for its own Section 1 cases.”)
The Warren Court also took a deferential approach to congressional power to enforce another Reconstruction Amendment, the Thirteenth Amendment, which prohibits slavery and involuntary servitude. Section Two of that Amendment is virtually identical to the enforcement provisions of the other Reconstruction Amendments. Unlike the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, however, the Thirteenth Amendment clearly applies to private action. In the case of Jones v. Mayer, plaintiffs alleged that defendant had refused to sell them a home because they were African Americans, in violation of a provision of the 1866 Civil Rights Act that prohibited race discrimination in the sale of real estate. In the majority opinion, Justice Potter Stewart held that the Thirteenth Amendment enforcement power authorized Congress to legislate to abolish “all badges and incidents of slavery,” and applied rational basis review to the use of that power.

The Court held that Congress’ determination that race discrimination in real estate transactions was a badge or incident of slavery was a rational one. Many of the Black Codes had limited the rights of Blacks to buy property. “And when racial discrimination herds men into ghettos and makes their ability to buy property turn on the color of their skin, then it too is a relic of slavery.” The Court’s decision in Jones has enormous symbolic significance. Its ruling in effect overturned the limited interpretation of 13th Amendment enforcement power in The Civil Rights Cases.\textsuperscript{168} Moreover, by reinvigorating this Reconstruction Era statute, the Court summoned the spirit of the Reconstruction Congress, yet rejected the activist intrusion of the Court of that era. Once again, the Warren Court deferred to Congress and championed Congress’ role as a protector of rights of belonging.

E. Congress in The Second Reconstruction

The Warren Court’s restraint towards congressional power to protect rights of belonging reinforced ongoing \textit{congressional} activism to protect those rights. After the Court upheld the 1964 Civil Rights Act, “a political logic took hold in which the elected branches of government perceived distinct rewards for approving civil rights legislation.”\textsuperscript{169} The judicial restraint of the Warren Court enabled Congress to play a leading role in this transformation by protecting rights of belonging in our society. Starting in the New Deal, federal statutes had been essential for the establishment of workers’ rights and an economic safety net.\textsuperscript{170} Beginning in 1964, statutes also became central to the nation’s civil rights agenda.\textsuperscript{171}

The 1964 Civil Rights Act and the 1965 Voting Rights Act were just the beginning of a period of congressional activism in protecting rights of belonging. By the mid 1970s, Congress had adopted the most far-reaching measures to protect those rights in our history. Other federal legislation prohibiting discrimination on the basis of race includes the Fair Housing Act, which prohibits race discrimination in real estate transactions, and the Equal Credit Opportunity Act of 1974. Congress enacted legislation prohibiting gender discrimination well before the Court recognized gender as a protected class, including the Equal Pay Act of 1963, Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act and Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, and the Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978. During this period, Congress also expanded the classifications of people whose rights were entitled to protection beyond those classifications recognized by the Court, prohibiting discrimination against the disabled and the elderly, and mandating access to public education for disabled children. Finally, Congress expanded the economic safety net that it had established during the

New Deal and enacted other anti-poverty measures including Medicaid, Medicare and the Supplemental Security Income program.\textsuperscript{179}

Even as the Rehnquist Court began its cutbacks on congressional power, Congress continued in its enduring role of protecting rights of belonging with the Americans with Disabilities Act in 1990,\textsuperscript{180} the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1991,\textsuperscript{181} the Family and Medical Leave Act in 1993,\textsuperscript{182} and the civil rights provision of the Violence Against Women Act in 1994.\textsuperscript{183} All of these statutes greatly expanded the rights of belonging of people in our country. The judicial restraint of the Warren Court helped to make them possible.

V. The Activism of the Rehnquist Court

Unfortunately, the Rehnquist Court did not share the Warren Court’s deference for its coordinate legislative branch. Instead, it adopted the activist approach toward Congress reminiscent of the Warren Court’s predecessors. Permeating many of the Rehnquist Court decisions is a deep distrust of politicians and the legislative process.\textsuperscript{184} While the Court’s intervention in the political process in its Bush v. Gore\textsuperscript{185} decision may be the most well-known example of this phenomenon,\textsuperscript{186} the most problematic manifestation of that activism was that Court’s cutbacks on congressional power to protect rights of belonging.\textsuperscript{187} As Jack Balkin and Sandy Levinson have argued, the Rehnquist Court replaced the Warren Court activism with a harsher, more conservative activism, “protecting state governments from civil rights plaintiffs, state officers from federal regulatory mandates, property owners from environmental regulation, and whites from affirmative action.”\textsuperscript{188} In a series of decisions, the Rehnquist Court imposed heightened scrutiny on federal legislation protecting rights of belonging and rejected congressional findings of law and fact supporting that legislation. These rulings inhibited the “democratic vindication of equality values,”\textsuperscript{189} placing our rights of belonging in jeopardy.\textsuperscript{190}

\textsuperscript{179} For example, in the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, Congress created ten federal programs to fight poverty, including the Office of Economic Opportunity, Head Start, and community action programs. See Nicholas Lemann, The Promised Land: The Great Black Migration and How It Changed America 156 (1992). Some civil rights leaders, including Martin Luther King, saw economic justice as essential to achieving civil rights. See Forbath, Caste, supra note 181 at 85-88 (1999) (discussing a campaign by some civil rights leaders for economic rights as well as “civil” rights). By contrast, the Court rejected claims of constitutional protection based on poverty. See Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471 (1970).

A. Commerce Clause

In \textit{United States v. Lopez}\textsuperscript{191} and \textit{United States v. Morrison},\textsuperscript{192} the Rehnquist Court restricted Congress’s Commerce Clause powers – and, correspondingly limited its ability to define rights of belonging. Most notably, in \textit{Morrison}, the Court struck down the civil rights provision of the Violence Against Women Act as beyond the Commerce Clause

\textsuperscript{186}Balkin & Levinson, supra note 3 at 1084 (Arguing that in Bush v. Gore, “The five Justice majority used the power of judicial review to short circuit the process of democratic representation, install a president of their choice, and help keep their revolution going.”)

\textsuperscript{192} 529 U.S. 598 (2000).
Congress had labeled the measure a civil rights act and compiled an extensive factual record documenting the overwhelming impact of gender-motivated violence on interstate commerce. Ignoring Congress’ characterization of the law as a civil rights measure, the Court framed the statute as a “family law” measure and held that it was beyond the Commerce Clause because it regulated activity that was not economic.

Even more striking, the Court breezily disregarded Congress’ factual record, noting merely “the existence of congressional findings is not sufficient, by itself, to sustain the constitutionality of Commerce Clause legislation.”

Congress had often used the Commerce Clause to enact anti-discrimination laws and protective labor laws, and the Morrison decision signaled an ominous return to early New Deal decisions where the Court imposed categorical limitations and struck down such laws. Although the Rehnquist Court rejected some challenges to commerce clause legislation in its last years, it retained the categorical distinction between what the Court defines as economic and non-economic legislation. Most importantly, the Court’s casual disregard of Congress’ fact finding in Morrison stands as a sharp contrast to the deferential rational basis approach of the Warren Court toward Congress’ use of the Commerce Clause to protect rights of belonging.

B. Section Five

The Rehnquist Court’s restrictions on Congress’ power to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment pursuant to Section Five of that Amendment marked its most dramatic departure from the Warren Court’s jurisprudence. In City of Boerne v. Flores, the Rehnquist Court struck down the Religious Freedom Restoration Act as beyond the scope of the Section Five power because Congress had gone beyond its proper, remedial role when it enacted the statute, and the Court established a new “congruence and proportionality” test to evaluate the constitutionality of Section Five-based legislation.\(^{199}\) The Court rejected the argument that the Morgan precedent allowed Congress autonomy to determine the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment and emphatically asserted its own preeminence in constitutional interpretation, maintaining that when Congress attempts to define the substance of unconstitutional conduct, it intrudes on the proper function of “the Judicial Branch . . . to say what the law is.”\(^{200}\) Rather than acting as a partner with Congress in protecting rights of belonging, the Rehnquist Court viewed Congress as an opponent, threatening the Court’s preeminence in matters of constitutional interpretation.\(^{201}\) Boerne thus severely curtails congressional autonomy to protect rights of belonging.\(^{202}\)

Rehnquist Court decisions applying Boerne treated the “congruence and proportionality” test as a type of strict scrutiny, carefully analyzing both the ends and means to strike down statutes protecting the rights of belonging of state employees. For example in Kimel v. Florida Board of Regents and Board of Trustees of the University of Alabama v. Garrett, the Court applied that test and struck down provisions authorizing state employees to sue their employers for age discrimination and discrimination on the basis of disability, respectively. In both instances, the Court determined that Congress lacked Section Five authority because the statutes were not appropriate remedial legislation under the congruence and proportionality test.

Most notable was the Court’s treatment in Garrett of the extensive factual record that Congress had compiled in support of its determination that people with disabilities were a “discrete and insular minority.” Congress had held numerous hearings throughout the United States at which people with disabilities had reported experiencing discrimination. Yet, just as it had in Morrison, the Court disregarded Congress’ factual record, pointing out that most (though not all) of it related to employees of private companies, not state employees. In these cases, the Rehnquist Court exhibited a 203 528 U.S. 62 (2000). The Kimel Court held that the ADEA would make much more conduct illegal than had previously been held to be unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause, and, thus, would impermissibly heighten the standard of scrutiny beyond that established by the Court for age-based classifications. Id. at 86.

204 531 U.S. 356 (2001). The Garrett Court found that even if there was a pattern of unconstitutional discrimination by the states, Title I of the ADA failed the congruence and proportionality test because it forbids disparate impact discrimination, which is “insufficient [to state a cause of action] even where the Fourteenth Amendment subjects state action to strict scrutiny.” Id. at 966.

207 The Court was considerably more deferential to congressional fact-finding when evaluating the Family Medical Leave Act as a sex equality measure in Nevada v. Hibbs. See Kennedy concurrence. Justice Rehnquist’s majority opinion noted that the Court’s deference was due to the fact that the Court had recognized a history of states discriminating on the basis of gender. This aspect of the opinion reinforces the Court’s position that the Court, and not Congress, is qualified to recognize a constitutional violation.
marked lacks of deference to Congress’ authority “at the expense of its own judgment about the correct legal outcome.”

C. Sovereign Immunity

Finally, the Rehnquist Court limited congressional authority to protect rights of belonging by reviving the doctrine of sovereign immunity to impose limitations on the ability of individual civil rights plaintiffs to sue states for violating their rights, and on Congress’ authority to authorize individuals to bring such suits. The Court held that Congress cannot use its Article I powers to abrogate sovereign immunity, and narrowly interpreted the only source of power remaining to Congress – Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment. The sovereign immunity cases are particularly significant because they deprive Congress of the only effective means of ensuring that rights of belonging are enforced against state governments.

VI. The Importance of Congressional Autonomy

In today’s political climate, the debate over judicial activism is integrally entwined with the debate over the role of values in law. Politicians on the right of the political spectrum have achieved significant political success arguing that unaccountable judges should not determine the meaning of the word marriage or the extent of the “right to life.” Those on the political left have found it difficult to answer these claims. Rather 208 Young, supra note 22 at 1145. Indeed, even though the Supreme Court acknowledged Congress’s power to enact the Family and Medical Leave Act pursuant to its Section Five powers in Nevada Dept. of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721 (2003), the Hibbs Court reiterated the congruence and proportionality test and reemphasized “that it falls to this Court, not Congress, to define the substance of Constitutional guarantees.” Id. at 728. See also Tennessee v. Lane, 124 S.Ct. 1978, 1987 (2004) (reiterating the congruence and proportionality test, but upholding the constitutionality of Title II of the ADA, which requires that public services and programs be accessible to the disabled, because laws affecting the right of access to courts have been strictly scrutinized by the Supreme Court).

than engaging in debate over the scope and meaning of values, they call for moral neutrality in the political realm\textsuperscript{212} and defend judicial decisions that established those rights. This is a mistake. In large part due to the paradigm of the activist Warren Court, courts as protectors of right have also played a hegemonic role in constitutional scholarship. Paradoxically, however, it is the judicial restraint of the Warren Court that provides the best model of the proper relationship of the branches with regard to rights of belonging.

For too long, proponents of rights of belonging have depended on courts to uphold their values.\textsuperscript{213} This is problematic not because most courts are not as proactive at protecting those rights as was the Warren Court, but because courts are simply not well suited to creating a robust model of rights of belonging. Constitutional scholars who support an expansion of rights of belonging should not fear the political debate over the meaning and scope of rights of belonging. Not only have the political branches been more protective of those rights throughout the history of our country, but they are better suited institutionally than courts to defining and protecting those rights.

Rights of belonging serve to shape and define our community. The reason why the “moral values” message of the political right has been so successful is that people naturally yearn for shared values and a shared sense of community.\textsuperscript{214} Those on the left should also be speaking about their values and emphasizing the importance of community – a community that is more inclusive and is based on a more expansive vision of who belongs to it.\textsuperscript{215} This must be done in the political arena, and cannot be confined to courts. Because courts are by and large external to that community, they are less well suited to define it. Moreover, the litigation process, with its jurisdictional barriers and limited fact-finding capabilities, is simply not as effective a forum for debating fundamental values as is the open-ended political process. Congressional protection of rights of belonging also enjoys a number of institutional advantages over court protection of those rights, including accountability, transparency, enforceability and flexibility in creating remedies. Most importantly, the political process entails an open debate in which diverse groups can participate and furthers the agency of political actors, including grass roots activists. The act of engaging in the political debate is itself an act of belonging, and can be extremely empowering for those who have historically been excluded or marginalized.

The members of the Warren Court recognized the importance of political engagement and allowed a great deal of latitude for members of Congress to resolve the most pressing moral issues of their time - the scope and meaning of rights of belonging. Yet, for some reason, this wisdom has been lost and obscured in the conventional understanding of the Warren Court Era, by those on both sides of the political 216 See ZIETLOW, ENFORCING EQUALITY, supra note 5 at Ch. 8.

217 As Mark Tushnet has pointed out, there is also a danger that a loss in the courts will stymie the political debate. See MARK TUSHNET, TAKING, supra note 19 at 169-172 (1999). Due to a number of Rehnquist Court rulings, the jurisdictional barriers to “impact” litigation have also increased significantly in recent years. See Zietlow & Morgan, supra note 4 at 1356-1366.

219 ZIETLOW, ENFORCING EQUALITY, supra note 4 at Ch. 8. It is important not to exaggerate these aspects of the congressional process. Many (perhaps most) important decisions in Congress are made behind closed doors, and compromises of principle are often made away from the watchful eyes of the people. However, the fact remains that “Congressional decisions still turn on whether appropriate (reasonable) justifications can be found for a vote.” Larry D. spectrum. Progressives have always understood the value of the activism of the Warren Court. The time has come to appreciate the value of that Court’s restraint.

VII. Conclusion

The view of the Warren Court as an activist protector of minority rights has become the conventional paradigm of the relationship between courts and legislatures with regard to rights of belonging. While the Warren Court’s defense of rights of belonging was certainly admirable, that role was neither paradigmatic of how courts operate in our constitutional system, nor does it tell the whole story about that Court. Minorities must resort to courts when the political process fails them. Still, the Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment saw Congress as the primary protector of those rights, and based on that understanding, the Warren Court allowed Congress to play that role.

Appreciating the restraint of the Warren Court is necessary not only to set the record straight, but also to reinvigorate the enduring role that Congress has played in protecting rights of belonging throughout the history of our country. Once we understand that Congress, and not the Court, is both the most likely and the best suited institution to protect those rights, then we can begin to engage in the political debate that is necessary for a robust model of rights of belonging in our society. The Warren Court recognized the value of this political debate – we should too.

\[221\] Of course, there are some notable exceptions. See, e.g., LUCAS Powe, supra note 3.
