Perpetuating Ageism via Adoption Standards and Practices

Sara C Mills, Marquette University
Perpetuating Ageism via Adoption Standards and Practices

“Ours is by no means a tradition limited to respect for the bonds uniting the members of the nuclear family.”¹

According to polls, more than a third of Americans have considered adoption at some point.² Adoption is a particularly age-related issue: the majority of people adopting in the United States are age forty or older.³ And while the population of prospective adoptive parents is comprised of “older” Americans, many adoption agencies set age limits for applicants and some courts have denied placement due to an adoptive parent’s age. Some parental screening during the adoption process is undoubtedly necessary for the protection of the children involved; however, the pervasive age limitations placed upon older Americans do not always serve children’s best interests. “Of all the stereotypes to which prospective adoptive parents have been subjected, that based on age is the most conspicuous.”⁴ And as one writer noted, “the moral views of every society have influenced its practice of adoption more heavily than have pragmatic considerations.”⁵ The systematic discrimination against older adoptive parents only preserves existing ageist stereotypes and propagates a narrow and unrealistic definition of what it means to be a family in the United States.

²Barbara Moe, Adoption 170-171 (2d. ed. 2007) (citing data from Child Welfare Information Gateway: while 26% of those polled said they had considered adoption, 16% of those actually took concrete steps to adopt, and 31% of those who took concrete steps actually completed an adoption.) See also Id., pp. 177-192 for tables of statistics gleaned from the Statewide Automated Child Welfare Information System (SACWIS) and the Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting Systems (AFCARS). Neither of these databases is comprehensive, however. SACWIS can only provide a snapshot of adoption in the U.S., because its data is based solely on case management of children involved in the child welfare system.
⁴Hal Aigner, Adoption in America Coming of Age 178 (1992)
Although this topic has wide-reaching consequences for the thousands of Americans who consider adoption each year, there is a dearth of scholarly literature addressing the hurdles that older adoptive parents face when navigating the process. Indeed, this article is the first in legal academic literature to examine the problem of age discrimination in adoptions, and it is also the first to suggest possible constitutional and statutory remedies. This is not to say that the issue has completely escaped notice; a small handful of authors have addressed age discrimination in adoption from a variety of other perspectives. Additionally, some statutes and case law demonstrate that there has been at least minimal legislative and judicial recognition of the problem. Still, the issue of age discrimination in adoption has received far less attention than has discrimination based on race or sexual orientation. Discrimination in adoption has been widely addressed by both opponents and proponents of same-sex adoption, and controversy in the early 90s over mixed race adoptions also generated some discussion. In fact, Congress passed the Multiethnic Placement Act in 1994 to prohibit discrimination on the basis of race, color, or national origin in the placement of children. These debates over other forms of discrimination centered largely on the moral dimensions of restricting adoptions. Many of the arguments made in the debate over adoption by same-sex couples, in particular, are also relevant to the age-discrimination issue; however, this is the first article to consider the extent to which those arguments may be extended to age discrimination.

The policy arguments in favor of allowing older adults to adopt are integrally related to the determination of a child’s best interests. As a society, we use the “best interest” standard to define the values and goals that we most respect. In 1998, the Joint Council on International Children’s Services Ethics Committee (JCICS) issued recommended standards of practice to its member agencies regarding the proper values upon which to focus in adoption proceedings. Often reproduced, this study on the values underlying American adoptions noted the importance of recognizing the innate worth and dignity in all human beings. But when an older applicant is denied the right to adopt, the agency, the court, and ultimately society, are saying that a child’s best interests cannot be properly served by an adult over the age of “X.” The decision implicitly rejects the worth and dignity of older individuals.

Yet, it is difficult to quantify the exact reasons upon which each decision is made; because so few contested cases reach the courts, there is a scant record from which to draw conclusions. Nationally, one study found that only 0.1% of adoption cases are litigated, and even fewer involve contested adoptive parents (0.001%). It is unclear how many of these contested cases are based on the age of the applicants. Similarly, many private agencies simply impose an absolute age limit for applicants above which no one is allowed to adopt. But generally speaking, it is the perceived decrease in the 10 It is also difficult to gain perspective given the lack of published case law.

---

11 GROZA & ROSENBERG, supra note 9, at 159.
12 See “Older Parent Adoption,” http://adoptive.adoption.com/child/older-parent-adoption.html; as an example, a private agency in Florida prohibits adoptive parents who are over the age of 45. It also accepts only those couples who are married: “Gift of Life Adoptions,” http://www.giftoflifeadoptions.com/adopt/qualification.html.
health and quality of life lived by older adults, and therefore the quality of life of the potential adoptive children, that leads to the denial of placement.

I begin with an overview of the adoption process and how age factors into adoption petitions. Adoption occurs in the United States through many methods; the most common are public agency adoptions, private agency adoptions, independent adoptions, foster adoptions, intercountry adoptions, and kinship adoptions. For many prospective adoptive parents, independent and intercountry adoptions are attractive because of the lengthy waiting periods and application restrictions that characterize domestic agency adoption.\(^\text{13}\) Given the breadth of the topic, non-relative domestic adoption will be the focus of this paper. While it is impossible to say how widespread the problem is, age discrimination in adoption proceedings undoubtedly exists. The lack of case law and scholarly writing on the topic should not be read as an indication that there isn’t a problem. Rather, courts and legislators should consider the existence of ageist discrimination in adoption. This perpetuation of discrimination and the hurdles it creates may deter older Americans from adopting children in need of homes.

Next, I explore policy reasons that favor adoptions by older applicants. Numerous articles and studies exist to analyze other types of discrimination in adoption proceedings, particularly placements that raise racial issues and placements with single parents or same-sex couples.\(^\text{14}\) Treating the aged as a homogenous collection of disabled or soon-to-be-disabled individuals does not reflect reality. Yet, stereotypes remain. “At the least, ageism is a tendency to stereotype old people as rigid, meddlesome, sexless, conservative, unhealthy, inactive, lonely, forgetful, and not very bright.”

Additionally, medical and technological advances have fundamentally altered not only what it means to be “old,” but also what it means to be a “family” in the 21st century.

Consequently, I argue that, given the societal realities and policy factors, age should not be a consideration in adoption proceedings. Although I argue that considerations of age are discriminatory, the path to remedying this discrimination is unclear. After an examination of constitutional protections and an analysis of state action, I follow with some possible reconfigurations of our current paradigm. I finish with a conclusion and suggestions for the future.

I. Adoption Overview and State Laws

Adoption is a creature of state law, with federal laws supplementing to dictate the direction of funding. Although Model Acts and Uniform Laws exist, only eight states have adopted the Uniform Adoption Act; therefore, there is very little uniformity across the nation in adoption law. One thing, however, is consistent: those affected by these laws are generally 40 or older. Whereas the mean average age for first time parenthood in the United States is 25, the majority of those adopting in the U.S. are 40 or older. Centers for Disease Control statistics on adoptive parents only categorize the age of adoptive parents up to 44 years. This research shows that about half of adoptive mothers

---

16 The ABA overwhelmingly endorsed the UAA in 1995 and a number of national adoption organizations, such as The National Council for Adoption, have also endorsed it. See Joel Tenenbaum, Introducing the Uniform Adoption Act, 30 Fam. L. Q. 333-334 (1996).
17 Martin, supra note 3.
fall into the 40-44 year old category, whereas only 3% of adoptive mothers are between 18-29 years of age.\textsuperscript{18} However, in this same age group of 18-29 year olds, 27% of women are biological mothers.\textsuperscript{19} Therefore, the current legislation governing adoptive parenthood affects older parents disproportionately.\textsuperscript{20}

Adoptions can be accomplished through many different routes, but every adoption must be approved by the court.\textsuperscript{21} Some adoptive children are foster children in a state welfare system, others are adopted by grandparents or step-parents, and still others are adopted from other countries. Some of these routes, such as open adoptions and international adoptions, are beyond the scope of this article.\textsuperscript{22} Additionally, although many older adoptive parents choose international adoptions because of the relaxed age limits,\textsuperscript{23} international adoptions are also beyond the scope of this article.\textsuperscript{24} Aside from those methods of adoption, the main differences in the types of adoption addressed by this article relate to the method by which prospective adoptive parents locate a child. Adoptions can generally be grouped into two categories: private adoptions and agency adoptions. However, agency adoptions can also be further categorized as public agency adoptions or private agency adoptions. In private adoptions, prospective adoptive parents

\textsuperscript{19}Id.

\textsuperscript{21}For example, in Wisconsin, a licensed child welfare agency or county or state department must be involved in all Wisconsin adoptions. See LYNN J. BODI, ET AL., \textit{ADOPTION LAW: START TO FINISH} 10 (2008).

\textsuperscript{22}See 2 AM. JUR. 2D ADOPTION § 2 (open vs. closed adoptions); 2 AM. JUR. 2D ADOPTION § 46 (intercountry adoptions).

\textsuperscript{23}Even these limits are changing, however. See Edward Cody & Jason Ukman, \textit{China to Tighten Adoption Rules: Foreign Parents Must be Younger, Healthy, Married}, WASH. POST, December 20, 2006 (giving last priority to adoptive parents over 50).

\textsuperscript{24}See “Parental Age Limits in International Adoption,” http://older-parent.adoptionblogs.com/weblogs/parental-age-limits-in-international-ado for a list of various countries and their age limitations for prospective adoptive parents.
usually contact the biological parent without the aid of an agency or service. This might be accomplished through friends, colleagues, church groups, or even the internet. In these situations, the adoptive child is relinquished directly to the adoptive parents; however, a court must still approve of the adoption for legal custody to transfer to the adoptive parents. Some evidence suggests that biological parents prefer independent adoptions because it offers them an opportunity to have a degree of control over the process and placement.

A. Private Agency Adoptions and the “Baby Market”

In the case of agency adoptions, the biological parent’s parental rights are terminated and custody of the child is relinquished directly to the agency. The agency then matches the child with prospective adoptive parents and conducts the requisite home studies and paperwork. If for any reason the agency, the court, or the prospective parents do not approve of the adoption, the legal custody of the child will remain with the agency. Public agency adoptions, on the other hand, usually occur through the state’s Department of Heath and Family Services. In these situations, many adoptive children are considered less “desirable” because of special mental, emotional, or physical needs or because they are older than the typical child available via a private agency. One recent study found that of children exiting state foster care programs through adoption in 2004, only 27% were ages three or younger. And although many adoptive parents desire to adopt infants, only 2% of children adopted from foster care were under one year of age.\textsuperscript{30} In fact, age can be such a negative factor for a child awaiting adoption, social workers often categorize children over the age of seven as “special needs.”\textsuperscript{31} Additionally, of all children leaving foster care in 2004, only 18% exited the system via adoption.\textsuperscript{32} And there is also a disparity between the racial and ethnic make-up of children who are adopted from foster care: of those children in foster care waiting for adoption, 38% were white; however, of the children who actually exited foster care via adoption, 42% were white.\textsuperscript{33} For black children, the statistics showed the opposite trend: while 38% of children waiting for adoption were black, only 32% of those who exited the system via adoption were black.\textsuperscript{34} Like older children, children of color are also often categorized as “special needs” because of divergent adoption trends.\textsuperscript{35} This data shows that public agency adoptions are demographically different from many private agency adoptions. This may be a contributing factor to adoptive parents’ preference for private adoptions. Although numbers can vary significantly from year to year, in 2000, only 18% of adoptions were completed through public agencies.\textsuperscript{36}

---

29 MOE, supra note 2, at 182.

The methods by which adoptions are accomplished are integrally related to the perpetuation of discrimination in the adoption process. Because adoptions are stressful on both the child and the parents, home visits, placement studies, and interviews usually preface the formalization of the adoption. In the case of private agency adoptions, the case managers and social workers conduct these preliminary matters according to agency

\textsuperscript{30} Id. at 190.
\textsuperscript{31} Id. at 5.
\textsuperscript{32} Id. at 183.
\textsuperscript{33} Id. at 184-185.
\textsuperscript{34} Id.
\textsuperscript{35} Id. at 5.
\textsuperscript{36} Id. at 170-171; in 2001, public agency adoptions rose to 39%.
standards and criteria as well as state guidelines. For example, in Wisconsin, at a minimum, the following areas must be assessed: motivation and commitment to adoption, physical and mental health, coping and problem solving, social and relationship history, criminal and caretaker background checks, parenting history and future plans, attitudes toward adoption and open adoptions, and safety of the home to be licensed for foster care.\(^{37}\) Other agencies require physical exams of prospective parents, letters of reference, proof of marriage, and examinations of employment and financial history.\(^{38}\) All of these steps required for approval are imposed in addition to agency-set limits such as marital status and age. A cursory search of private agency websites shows a strong preference for married couples, those who attend a Christian church, and prohibitions of applicants who are anywhere from 40 to 50 years old.\(^{39}\) However, private agencies do exist that promote non-discriminatory policies regarding age, race, sexuality, and marital status.\(^{40}\) When an agency’s values and beliefs are part of the rubric for measuring appropriate placement, discrimination is more likely to occur.

\(^{37}\) See Bodi, \textit{supra} note 21.

\(^{38}\) MOE, \textit{supra} note 29, at 3.

\(^{39}\) See, e.g., “1-800-ADOPTION,” \texttt{http://www.americanadoptions.com/adopt/adoptive_program} (married couples only, no one over the age of 50); “Catholic Charities Diocese of Fort Worth, Inc.,” \texttt{http://www.ccdofw.org/index.html} (no one over the age of 65); “Adoption Network Law Center,” \texttt{http://www.adoptionnetwork.com/adoptiveparents/parentsintake.shtml} (preference to those under 50); “Angel Adoption, Inc.,” \texttt{http://www.angeladoptioninc.com/hoping-to-adopt.html} (no age limit, but birth mother makes final decision); “Spence-Chapin Adoption Agency,” \texttt{http://www.spence-chapin.org/adoption-programs/b4_faqA.php} (preference to those under 50); “Adoption Support Center,” \texttt{http://www.adoptionsupportcenter.com/} (preference for those under 40); “Adoption Angels,” \texttt{http://www.adoptionangels.com/adoption-faqs.htm} (no one over the age of 50); “Adoption Planning, Inc.,” \texttt{http://www.adoptionplanning.org/adoptivefamily.html} (no one over the age of 45); “Catholic Charities Diocese of Arlington,” \texttt{http://www.centerforadoptionservices.org/forms.html} (no one over the age of 48); “Child Place,” \texttt{http://www.childplace.org/prospective.html} (no one over the age of 45); “Deaconess pregnancy and Adoption Services,” \texttt{http://www.deaconnessadoption.org/} (no one over the age of 45); “Nightlight Christian Adoptions,” \texttt{http://www.nightlight.org/} (preference for those in their 30s or very early 40s).

\(^{40}\) See “Independent Adoption Center,” \texttt{http://www.adoptionsupportcenter.com/} (“IAC is one of the only adoption agencies in the country that has never had any exclusionary policies for adoptive parents, including age, sexual orientation, marital status, religion, ethnic background, color, or race”).
Additionally, many private agency adoptions are, in their simplest form, for-profit business transactions. Public agencies receive tax money to help fund their operations, but most private agencies’ main source of income are the fees charged for their services. Thirty three per cent of people who used private agencies reported spending over $10,000 on the adoption process.\(^{41}\) In contrast, only 15% of those who used public agencies reported spending over $5,000 on the adoption process.\(^{42}\) While no one likes to imagine adoption as a money-making enterprise,\(^{43}\) and despite laws prohibiting the exchange of money during adoptions, many services are “selling” prospective adoptive parents to biological parents who are planning to give up their child. For example, on one website, an agency touts its fast turnaround time as a result of its “aggressive,” “results-oriented” “marketing.”\(^{44}\) Other sites allow prospective parents to specify the ethnicity of their baby for a flat fee of $34,000.\(^{45}\)

Regrettably, certain ethnicities appear to have less “value” than others: the same private agency that charges a $34,000 flat fee also offers the same flat fee service for bi-racial and African American children. However, it only charges $18,000 for these children.\(^{46}\) When women who were actively seeking to adopt were polled, definite preferences for certain types of children emerged. Girls were preferred by 34.6% of

\(^{42}\) Id.

\(^{43}\) This statement should be qualified with a mention of Judge Richard Posner’s traditionally economist bent on the topic. He advocated a “legal baby market” with fellow economist Elizabeth M. Landes, arguing that the cost of adoption would probably decrease if a “free market” were established. See Elizabeth M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, The Economics of the Baby Shortage, 7 J. LEGAL STUD. 323 (1978).

\(^{46}\) Id. at http://www.giftoflifeadoptions.com/adopt/special.html.
respondents, whereas boys were preferred by only 28.9% of respondents. Younger children are overwhelmingly favored: 49.2% of respondents preferred a child under the age of two, but fewer than 5% preferred a child aged 13 or over. The adoption process can be particularly difficult for older children, because they are hardest to place. Only 30.9% of respondents said they “would accept” a child age 13 or older. But the widest disparity between supply and demand was based on race: no prospective adoptive white women responded that they would “prefer” an African American child; additionally, when they were asked if they “would accept” an African American child, only 83.6% said they would. Prospective African American adoptive women showed the same preference in reverse: only 75% “would accept” a white child, and none preferred a white child. These preferences support the supply and demand discussions that often permeate the adoption discourse. The economics of “market demand” show that certain children are more likely to be adopted than others, and certain adoptive children are more “desired” than others.

Older adoptive parents are thus faced with fewer agencies with which they can work to find a child because of age limits. These private agencies are often the primary source for “desirable” children, because most older children and those with physical or mental impairments enter the adoption process through state foster programs. As one writer noted, the “state-run domestic market--comprised nearly entirely of older, minority, and special needs children--is one of the few sectors of the domestic baby trade

48 Id.
49 Id.
50 Id.
51 Id.
not lacking in supply: In 2004, 118,000 foster children were available for adoption, more than double the 52,000 children actually adopted from the system that year.™52 And because these private agencies traditionally place more “desirable” infants and children for adoption than public agencies, older adoptive parents are also often at a disadvantage when trying to be matched with a traditionally “desired” child via a private agency. These limitations are even further compounded, because most private agencies allow biological parents to play an integral role in the selection process.

While the exact amount of control that a biological parent has over the adoption process varies, many private adoption agencies proactively advertise expanded involvement to biological mothers as a “selling point.” Many go so far as to advertise that the biological mother can have complete control over the choice of adoptive parents. Most websites feature adoptive parent “profiles” so that incoming biological parents can get a sense of the types of families served. These profiles almost uniformly include pictures of young, attractive, white couples.53 The websites also often have separate sections that advise biological mothers about how they should select adoptive parents. Websites regularly recommend that biological mothers consider the age of prospective adoptive parents when making their choice.54 Because most private agencies screen adoptive parents before biological parents can see their profiles, most biological parents will never even consider older prospective parents. And even where older couples or individuals are not filtered out, the biological parents can still make their ultimate determination based on the age of the adoptive parents. This sort of “double filtering process” means that older adoptive parents face an even greater risk of being rejected during the private agency adoption process.

---

54 See Id.

So what incentive does a private agency have to discriminate against an older adoptive parent? It is nearly impossible to identify an agency’s motives with any certainty, but the reality of the “baby market” is undeniable. Simply put, the number of children available for adoption has decreased dramatically over the last several decades, but the demand for adoptive children has not followed suit. It is possible that, when setting their age limits, some agencies may simply adhere to outmoded stereotypes that promote the idea of older adults’ diminished capacities and abilities. However, given the high costs associated with adoption, and biological parents’ general preference for younger couples, it is in the adoption agencies’ financial interests to maintain a pool of “desirable” adoptive parents. “It’s a seller’s market.” The more desirable the adoptive parents, the more likely the biological parent will choose to relinquish her “desirable” child to that specific agency. Hence, the cycle perpetuates itself. The more desirable children an agency has to offer, the more likely potential “customers” are to select that agency for their adoption.

B. Legal Framework for Adoptions

Federal laws, while silent on age, prohibit denial or delay of the opportunity to become an adoptive or foster parent on the basis of race, color, or national origin. And no state statute allows age to be the sole determining factor in the disapproval of an

---

55 See Landes & Posner, supra note 43; Krawiec, supra note 52, at 247-249.
56 Jones, supra note 18.
57 Krawiec, supra note 55, at 231.
adoption petition, many statutes explicitly or implicitly allow age to be considered.\textsuperscript{59} For example, in Wisconsin, the statutes prohibit the denial of an adoption petition to an otherwise fit person because of religious belief, physical handicap, race, color, ancestry, or national origin.\textsuperscript{60} Because age is omitted from the statute, it is a permissible consideration in adoption proceedings.\textsuperscript{61} Further, some states that prohibit the denial of adoptions for racial, ethnic, and religious reasons have carved out exceptions that allow the biological parent to discriminate for those reasons.\textsuperscript{62} Additionally, even those states in which legal precedent has established that age must not be the sole determining factor in the denial of an adoption petition, case law often exists to illustrate that decisions have been made on this basis regardless of precedent.\textsuperscript{63} In examining the age of petitioners, courts have made reference to the relationship between an adoptive parent's advanced age and the likelihood that the child will suffer the loss of the parent during a period of the child's growth, the problem that age can be a factor affecting the ability of the adoptive parent to supply the material needs of the child, the problem that a child might be under a psychological burden in having an adoptive parent old enough to be a grandparent, the circumstance that as people grow old they tend to become more fixed and inflexible in their mental attitudes, the consideration that advanced age limits the ability of the adoptive parent to participate in various social and school activities with the child, and

\textsuperscript{59} For examples of cases interpreting state laws, see 84 A.L.R.3d 665.
\textsuperscript{60} Wis. Stat. § 48.82(4)-(6).
\textsuperscript{61} But see In re Adoption of Tachick, 210 N.W.2d 865 (Wis. 1973) (noting that although agencies often set disqualifying age limits, the age of the applicant must not be conclusive).
\textsuperscript{62} See, e.g., Ky. Stat. § 199.471 (“Petitions for adoption of children placed for adoption by the cabinet or a licensed child-placing institution or agency shall not be denied on the basis of the religious, ethnic, racial, or interfaith background of the adoptive applicant, unless contrary to the expressed wishes of the biological parent(s)").
\textsuperscript{63} See, e.g., Madsen v. Chasten, 286 N.E.2d 505 (Ill.App.Ct. 1972) (holding that age may not be the controlling factor in adoption petitions); see also Williams v. Neumann, 405 S.W.2d 556 (Ky. 1966) (holding that, in the absence of statutory standards, age may not be controlling); In re Adoption of Brown, 85 So.2d 617 (Fla. 1956) (holding that age should not be controlling, especially where future proceedings would result).
the problem that an older adoptive parent may find it more difficult to muster the physical effort required to control a young child. 64

Courts have held that a great age difference between a prospective adoptive parent and the child will preclude the adoption, usually in addition to other negative factors. For example, in H v. Children's Service Division, an Oregon court called the petitioners’ ages, 57 and 31 respectively, “unfavorable evidence” to the adoption petition. 65 Not only did the court note that the father would be 70 when the child reached the age of 13, but the court looked negatively upon the age disparity between the husband and wife. 66 In another case, prospective adoptive parents who were in their 50s were denied an adoption where other negative factors included the fact that another couple wished to adopt the child in which both the man and woman were in their 20s. 67 Additionally, in Adoption of Driscoll, despite the fact that the California State Department of Social Welfare recommended approval of the adoption petition, the court denied placement to a couple of “advanced age” who were 61 and 58 years old. 68 In that case, the prospective adoptive father’s health was also considered; although at the time of the petition, he was in perfectly good health, the fact that he had previously suffered from cerebral arteriosclerosis was considered a negative factor related to his age. 69 And in In Re Adoption of Brown, the court denied the adoption petition of a couple who had been capably caring for a child for two years. 70 The husband was 42 and the wife was 50, and

---

64 See 84 A.L.R.3d 665.
66 Id.
69 Id. at 384.
70 In Re Adoption of Brown, 92 N.W.2d 749 (Wis. 1958).
the court held that the department of public welfare, as guardian of child, was not arbitrary or capricious in denying their petition because of their ages.71

Even where the language of statutes appears flexible and pragmatic with respect to the age of petitioners, courts and agencies can and have applied the standards improperly. For example, the guidelines of the California State Department of Health in effect in 1975 stated that the age of petitioners:

should be evaluated in relation to other factors, recognizing that the ability of a person of a given age to care for a child will vary according to his physical and emotional health as well as his flexibility and general outlook on life. In the total evaluation, the age of the adopting parent should be considered only as it relates to all the study factors, including the length of time that the child has been in the home and the relationships that have been established.72

However, that language was improperly read to deny the prospective adoptive parents’ petition because of their ages (70 and 54).73 Their ages were the only factors considered by the California Department of Health in denying the adoption. In overruling the Department, the court held that age alone cannot be used to automatically exclude a prospective adoptive parent.74 However, the language in that guideline was not included in the California Civil Code, and the current California Family Code only provides that an adoptive parent must be ten years older than the prospective adoptive child.75 Given that even “age-neutral” guidelines are inappropriately applied, it is likely that agencies and courts deny adoptions to otherwise fit parents solely because of their age; it is just as likely that analysis of these decisions will be hampered due to the lack of litigation.

71 Id.
73 Id.
74 Id.; see also In re Adoption of Haun, 286 N.E.2d 478 (Ohio Ct. App. 1972) (finding that an agency’s denial of adoption petition to couple solely because they were aged 68 and 55 was arbitrary and capricious). See AIGNER, supra note 6, at 176-178 for a discussion and analysis of the case.
75 CAL. FAM. CODE § 8601; see also N.J. STAT. ANN. § 9:3-43.
Additionally, in those cases where prospective adoptive parents of “advanced age” succeed in their adoption petitions, the court often looks to other factors to justify the adoption. Rather than being irrelevant to the determination, the petitioners’ ages are still seen as an impediment to be overcome or as a negative influence that must be balanced by other beneficial factors. For example, in Adoption of T., the court granted the petition of a prospective adoptive couple who were 54 and 70.76 The court felt that other factors militated against the petitioners’ ages, including that the child had lived with the couple since its birth, the mother had a life expectancy that was sufficient to guide the child to adulthood, and because of the excellent health of both petitioners.77 Despite the fact that the couple was otherwise fit, had a stable marriage, and was financially secure, the court still focused on “overcoming” the impediment of age.

States also determine a child’s best interest in varying ways, which adds to the complexity of the adoption process. States generally provide a flexible statutory basis by which they can measure how a child’s best interests will be affected by adoption. As a general rule, courts required to make a child custody determination must be guided by the "best interest" and welfare of the child. While the "best interests" standard is well recognized, it is often difficult to apply because it requires consideration on a case-by-case basis of numerous factors. The Wisconsin Statutes provide a typical example of factors that courts must consider during custody and placement determinations. They include the wishes of the parent(s), the wishes of the child, the age and development of the child, the existence of criminal records, reports from experts, and a broad catch-all:

---

77 Id.
“such other factors as the court may in each individual case determine to be relevant."

And while courts may apply these factors inconsistently, private adoption agencies, which often play the primary role of intermediary and broker, also often use these factors in divergent ways.

II. Policy Considerations

Many commentators believe that, on a very basic level and without considering motivations behind such practices, denial of adoption petitions because of age is discriminatory and unacceptable. Even without examining factors such as longevity, health, and finances, there is an inherent unfairness in denying a willing and fit party the right to adopt a child who needs a home. As Elizabeth Bartholet, herself an adoptive mother over 40, opined, “Why would anyone think that those who consciously plan to adopt someone else’s child pose more of a risk than those who fall unwittingly into pregnancy? What real threat do adoptive parents pose to children who cannot in any event be raised by the biologic parents—to children who are being raised by foster families or in institutions or on the streets?"

When faced with placing a child into a prospective adoptive family, private agencies rank the potential parents in ways that often favor those applicants who most closely resemble a “socially traditional family model.” Those who do not fit this model, including single people, older people, gay people, and disabled people, are either placed lower on the list or excluded altogether. This system led Bartholet to conclude, “Discrimination is the name of the game in adoptive parenting.

78 WIS. STAT. § 767.41(5).
79 MOE, supra note 38, at 2-3, 74-75, 223.
80 BARTHOLET, supra note 6, at 69.
81 Id. at 70.
82 Id. at 70-71; see also Benjamin C. Morgan, Adopting Lawrence: Lawrence v. Texas and Discriminatory Adoption Laws, 53 EMORY L.J. 1491, 1503 (2004) (not all agencies abide by this placement hierarchy).
Those who procreate live in a world of near-absolute rights with respect to parenting… increasingly the law forbids discrimination… It is only in the area of adoption that our system proudly proclaims not simply the right to discriminate but the importance of doing so.”

Further, even the “traditional” concept of family upon which adoption agencies and state courts base their decisions is rapidly becoming a fallacy. The intact, nuclear family is in many ways an illusion, yet it is one that we as a society seem particularly reluctant to part with. The “family” is evolving in countless ways: single parents head a major portion of households, grandparents increasingly raise their grandchildren, gay couples have begun to both adopt and use fertility treatments, and divorce has continued to shape the concept of family. Particularly, as more women delay pregnancy in favor of pursuing a career, many women become first-time mothers after the age of 40 even without the help of fertility treatments. These first-time parents often take additional steps to ensure that their quality of life and longevity will be sufficient to see their children into adulthood; simply because they become parents later in life does not mean they fail to take proactive steps to ensure a loving and stable home for their children. And given the advancement of Assisted Reproductive Technology (ART), women are able to become biological parents far later in life than ever before.

Assisted Reproductive Technology is mooting many of the arguments advanced by those who do not support older parenthood. Infertility affects about 7.3 million women and their partners in the U.S., which is about 12% of the reproductive-age population.

---

83 BARTHOLET, supra note 80.
85 Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, supra note 47.
Many couples whose ages surpass those in the traditional reproductive-age category are also turning to ART in order to build a family. In 2003, there were 1,512 first-time mothers between the ages of 45 and 54 in the United States. This growth trend is also present in other countries, such as the United Kingdom, where birth rates for every age group above 30 have risen while birth rates for those under 30 have dropped. These new methods of procreation allow older couples to conceive that wouldn’t be able to before, and there are virtually no established and enforced age limitations on these procedures. Medical and legal ethicists have commented on the potential for abuse, and highly publicized examples of the downsides of ART are everywhere. Not only do we see stories about those in their 20s and 30s making poor reproductive decisions (the “Octo-Mom” being a ripe example), those in their 50s, 60s, and beyond have come under the same scrutiny.

Who regulates these decisions? In some European countries, the State has enmeshed itself in the process by establishing some regulations. In Denmark, the State pays for three rounds of fertility treatment for any woman needing them— but only three rounds, and only if the woman is under the age of forty. And in Italy, the Italian Parliament passed the Medically Assisted Reproduction Law that does not allow certain classes of people—including women past child-rearing age—to reproduce if they cannot 88 For example, one woman made headlines when she died at the age of 69, leaving her 3 year-old twin sons parentless. She conceived the boys at the age of 66 using ART. Graham Keeley, Oldest mother, Maria Carmen del Bousada, dies at 69, leaving baby orphans, TIMES ONLINE, July 16, 2009, http://www.timesonline.co.uk/tol/news/world/europe/article6714820.ece. However, other news stories chronicle the lives of first-time mothers in their mid- to late-fifties who live seemingly healthy and happy lives with their biological children. See, e.g., More older women reveling in motherhood, MSNBC.COM, Dec. 3, 2004, http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/6593933.

do so naturally. The Italian law applies regardless of the person’s stability, health, or level of commitment to parenthood. But in the United States, there certainly is no third party examining the best interests of the children in each case involving ART. Procreation is a fundamental right in the U.S., and so any state regulation of ART and its consequences will be difficult given the required strict scrutiny analysis. Indeed, even the ABA Model Act Governing Assisted Reproductive Technology makes no mention of the age of prospective parents at all. Ultimately, this process allows older adults, who would otherwise be denied the opportunity to adopt, an alternative avenue to becoming parents.

Now that older adults are able to become biological parents, and now that substantial numbers of older adults are embracing these opportunities, adoption agencies and courts need to rethink how they select appropriate applicants. If an older adult is determined to become a parent, he or she has multiple options to do so; foreclosing adoption completely is not an appropriate response. When an agency turns away an older applicant, not only is it possible that the person will find other ways to become a parent, it is also very possible that a child has been denied a loving home. These misguided ideologies should not take precedent over the best interests of the child. According to AFCARS, in 2004 there were 118,000 children in foster care with an identified goal of adoption and/or whose parents’ parental rights had been terminated. Forty-five percent of those “waiting” children had been in continuous foster care for three or more years.\textsuperscript{94} Clearly, there is a glut of children in need of adoptive homes, and older Americans are finding ways other than adoption to become parents. However, given the balancing of interests involved in adoption proceedings—those of the child, the biological parents, the adoptive parents, and even the state itself—simply eliminating any and all bars to adoption may not be a tenable goal. Instead, rebutting the pre-existing presumptions that color society’s perceptions of older adults may lead to increased access and success for those older adoptive parents in an inherently discriminatory process.

92 Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942); Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992) (“Marriage and procreation are fundamental to the very existence and survival of the race”).
93 Cited in MOE, supra note 79, at 184, T. 6.13.

Certainly as medicine and technology have progressed, older Americans are able to live longer and enjoy a greater quality of life as they age. The life expectancy of the average American in 2009 was estimated at 78.11 years.\textsuperscript{95} In the CDC’s Health-Related Quality of Life study, completed in 2007, researchers found that in addition to age, factors such as income and education affected quality of life perceptions. Research also showed that younger Americans aged 18-24 suffered the most mental health stress.\textsuperscript{96} However, older adults still reported having the most poor physical health days and the most activity limitations.\textsuperscript{97} Although it is certain that as we age, we will decline in health and suffer from physical and mental limitations, these types of limitations do not necessarily reduce or eliminate those skills necessary to raise children. Legislatures have seen fit to exclude categorically physical handicap from consideration in adoption proceedings; it is unclear why physical limitations that accompany advanced age should \textsuperscript{94} Id. at 185, T. 6.14.

\textsuperscript{95} CIA WORLD FACTBOOK, available at https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/rankorder/2102rank.html; for trends, see Melonie Heron et al., Deaths: Final Data for 2006, 57 NATIONAL VITAL STATISTICS REPORT NO. 14, (2009), available at http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/data/nvsr/nvsr57/nvsr57_14.pdf (showing that life expectancy has increased nearly 7 years in the last half-century).
\textsuperscript{96} Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, supra note 85, at http://www.cdc.gov/hrqol/findings.htm.
\textsuperscript{97} Id.
be treated differently. And yet, adoption guides are blunt about the perceived lack of ability and capacity of older adults. “Anyone nearing middle age who is considering adoption of a very young child should remember: … if you’re pushing forty-five…daily chores that a toddler creates may so deplete your energy and frazzle your nerves that you just can’t be the warm, sunny, unruffled mother he is entitled to have.”98 That statement, from a book published 35 years ago, may strike even the most prejudiced of ears as being, at best, trite; as technology, medicine, and lifestyles have evolved, the amount of “middle-agers” who both conceive children and successfully manage their upbringing is becoming a common occurrence. Moreover, plenty of “young” parents can only charitably be called “frazzled” or “ruffled” during the worst toddler meltdowns. But the fact remains that a large portion of society, particularly those whose business is adoption, still believes that older people simply can’t succeed as parents.

Additionally, the concept of a “traditional” adoptive child is disappearing. Infants do not make up the majority of children adopted in the United States, and it is estimated that 11.8% of adopted children had at least one disability as of the year 2000 (compared with 5.2% of biological children).99 As the make-up of the pool of adoptive children changes to include older children, those with varied racial and ethnic backgrounds, and children with traumatic upbringings, the complexity and importance of the child’s best interests is magnified. Despite the possibility of physical limitation, older adults with established marriages, jobs, finances, and lives may often be best suited to guide these children into adulthood. Whereas 20-somethings may be dealing with stresses related to establishing...

their careers, finances, and marriages. “older” adults who have already encountered and conquered these life issues may be able to devote more time to a needy child. Considering that the adoption process is contingent upon “matching” prospective adoptive parents with “appropriate” children, capable older adults may often present the best possible fit in any given adoption case.

III. Searching for a Remedy: Constitutional Rights and Protections

While courts and legislatures have addressed age discrimination in many areas of daily life, they have yet to prohibit or even acknowledge age discrimination in adoption. Admittedly, the issue presents a very complicated and controversial conundrum, but it is a practice that should no longer be condoned. Federal laws exist that prevent age discrimination in employment,100 but there are currently no federal laws that serve to protect older Americans who want to expand their families. Additionally, titles III and IV of the Civil Rights Act only protect against classifications based on race, color, religion, and national origin;101 there is no mention of age. So how is someone who is discriminated against to proceed? At first glance, this type of discrimination may appear to be a violation of the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court long ago held that the Constitution protects an individual’s right “to marry, establish a home, and bring up children.”102 But current Due Process and Equal Protection jurisprudence does not provide convincing support for age discrimination claims. Additionally, cases in which homosexuals have challenged adoption denials using similar Constitutional arguments have also failed. Absent legislation, in order for older adoptive parents to be granted the highest level of protection, adoption must either be classified as a fundamental right, or age must be considered a suspect classification. Neither avenue has proved successful, as the Constitution has failed to provide a solution for other age-related and adoption discrimination claims. Nevertheless, courts should become more receptive to Equal Protection claims, while legislatures should proactively work to end the problem.

100 29 USC §621 (Age Discrimination in Employment Act); 29 USC §6101 (Age Discrimination Act of 1975).

A. Adoption as a Fundamental Right

The first of the two constitutional arguments is that adoption is a fundamental right protected by the Due Process Clause, though it is the less explored and developed of the two. This assertion may seem at odds with the established fact that procreation is considered a fundamental right. However, procreation is not treated as the equivalent of adoption, even though, for a significant portion of the population, adoption is the sole path to family status.

Merriam-Webster’s Medical Dictionary defines “procreate” as “to beget or bring forth offspring,” and The American Heritage Dictionary defines “procreate” as “[t]o produce or create; originate.” Adoption allows a couple or individual to “produce” or “create” a family; “the idea that each individual has the right to experience the gift of parenthood has been increasingly acknowledged in the broader culture and has led to a 104 Even this right is limited: the right to “procreate” does not survive incarceration. Gerber v. Hickman, 291 F.3d 617 (9th Cir. 2002). The Gerber case raises an interesting question, but one that is beyond the scope of this paper: does the fundamental right of procreation survive physical incapacity?

greater acceptance and respect for various forms of nontraditional families.”107 And while some scholars have argued that adoptive “procreation” should entail similar rights as biological procreation,108 courts have recognized a difference. While biological families have their “origins entirely apart from the power of the State,” foster families and adoptive families have as their source “state law and contractual arrangements.”109 Courts have called the difference between adoption and procreation “striking,” and have explained, “Adoption always involves the weighing and balancing of many competing interests. The rights of a couple to adopt must be reconciled with the state's interest in protecting the existing rights of the natural parents, as well as in securing ultimately the welfare of the child.”110

The requirements of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment only apply to deprivations of property or liberty interests.111 For substantive Due Process purposes, an interest will qualify as a liberty interest only if it is both fundamental and traditionally protected by our society. In adoption proceedings, courts have generally looked at the best interests of the child, and so the child’s interest has been the interest upon which the “traditionally protected” analysis has focused. However, these interests are not tantamount to either property or liberty interests. “The right to have the child’s best interests be the paramount consideration in the adoption proceedings is neither fundamental nor traditionally protected by our society.”112 And courts have also held that 111 Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 569 (1972).

112 Angel Lace M., 516 N.W.2d 678, 685 (Wis. 1994) (emphasis added).
adoption has not traditionally been protected by our society. Therefore, not only is adoption not a fundamental right currently, but the deprivation of the right to adopt is not considered synonymous with the deprivation of a liberty interest. In order to change this outcome, courts should recognize the traditionally protected interest of intimate association in addition to the child’s interests, and courts should endorse the longstanding value of adoption in this country.

A basic examination of the history of the United States provides support for this conclusion: adoption is a practice that has been traditionally valued and protected by society. To hold otherwise is to ignore thousands of years of history. Written adoption laws existed as early as 1780 BC, and modern American adoption laws based on Napoleonic Codes and Roman adoption laws have been in use since the late 1800s. By the mid-1950s, 90,000 children per year were being placed for adoption. Certainly, the values underlying adoption and the procedures used to accomplish it have evolved; but to say that adoption is not a traditionally recognized and protected aspect of our culture is ill informed at best. However, even if one could successfully challenge this conclusion and elevate adoption to the status of a “traditionally protected” interest, courts would still need to consider it a fundamental right.

It is not the province of courts to “create” fundamental rights; rather, fundamental rights are only those implicitly or explicitly guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. “For

---

113 Id.
116 See MOE, supra note 93, at 123-144 (giving a detailed chronology of the history of adoption); see also BABB, supra note 9, at 28-42.
117 Id.
118 GROZA & ROSENBERG, supra note 11, at 110.
a right … to be characterized as fundamental … the right must be deeply rooted in the nation's history and tradition and be so implicit in the concept of ordered liberty that neither liberty nor justice would exist if it were sacrificed."\textsuperscript{119} Therefore, courts do not consider adoption, even if traditionally-protected, the type of liberty interest that the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to protect.

While courts consider the interests of the children involved in adoption proceedings, they must also examine the interests of adoptive parents in their analyses. While a child’s best interests may not be considered fundamental,\textsuperscript{120} the adoptive parent’s right to adopt should be. Courts must reexamine the contradictory nature of their holdings and recognize that adoption is an integral part of the fundamental right of intimate association. The Supreme Court has recognized “that choices to enter into and maintain certain intimate human relationships must be secured against undue intrusion by the State because of the role of such relationships in safeguarding the individual freedom that is central to our constitutional scheme.”\textsuperscript{121} This includes the most intimate forms of association provided by the relationships created within families. “[C]ertain kinds of personal bonds have played a critical role in the culture and traditions of the Nation by cultivating and transmitting shared ideals and beliefs; they thereby foster diversity and act as critical buffers between the individual and the power of the State.”\textsuperscript{122} And as the Supreme Court recognized, “cutting off any protection of family rights at the first

\textsuperscript{120} Angel Lace M., 516 N.W.2d 678 (Wis. 1994).

\textsuperscript{121} Roberts, 468 U.S. at 617-18.

\textsuperscript{122} Id. at 618-619.
convenient, if arbitrary boundary[.] the boundary of the nuclear family,” is antithetical to the Constitution’s guarantees in the Bill of Rights.\textsuperscript{123}

The Supreme Court has also indirectly recognized the right to familial privacy in the integrity of a family unit for families consisting of foster parents and foster children.\textsuperscript{124} Those courts that have deemed adoptive families to be strikingly different than biological families have neglected to follow established precedent: “Our decisions establish that the Constitution protects the sanctity of the family precisely because the institution of the family is deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition."\textsuperscript{125} While we may quibble over the exact definition of a term such as “procreate,” there is far less uncertainty about the definition of a “family.” “Biological relationships are not [the] exclusive determination of the existence of a family.”\textsuperscript{126} That the bonds created between a parent and her child were not fostered in the womb does not make them any less deserving of recognition and protection. As Justice Harlan explained in his dissent in \textit{Poe
v. Ullman}, the liberty interest protected by the Due Process Clause “is not a series of isolated points pricked out…[i]t is a rational continuum which, broadly speaking, includes a freedom from all substantial arbitrary impositions and purposeless restraints.”\textsuperscript{127} The right to adopt without reference to the age of the petitioners is merely part of that continuum of liberty interests protected by the Constitution.

Furthermore, accepting adoption as a fundamental right will not jeopardize the best interests of the children involved; the misconception that fundamental rights may not \textsuperscript{123} \textit{Moore}, 431 U.S. 494.

\textsuperscript{124} \textit{Smith}, 431 U.S. at 842 (“There can be, of course, no doubt of appellees' standing to assert this interest, which, to whatever extent it exists, belongs to the foster parents as much as to the foster children”).
\textsuperscript{126} \textit{Smith}, 431 U.S. at 843.
\textsuperscript{127} \textit{Poe}, 431 U.S. at 543 (Harlan, J., dissenting).
be abridged in any way is too often assumed where two competing interests meet. Fundamental rights are not absolute. Instead, fundamental rights are those rights most stringently protected from infringement.\textsuperscript{128} The fundamental right of adoption need not be framed in an overly-broad or overly-narrow manner, though “[t]he selection of a level of generality necessarily involves value choices.”\textsuperscript{129} The competing interests and values inherent in the adoption process could shape its contours; for example, it might be recognized simply as the right of any individual to adopt any other individual. Conversely, it could be stated as the right of an otherwise fit adult to adopt a minor child. If the right is described in very specific terms, there exists a risk that it will be disconnected from previously established rights of parenthood, procreation, and intimate association and thus be denied.\textsuperscript{130} In some cases, such as \textit{Bowers v. Harwick}, courts have easily distinguished a narrowly defined right from the broad, pre-existing fundamental rights used to support it.\textsuperscript{131} However, given the breadth of rights already protected, including the rights of child rearing,\textsuperscript{132} familial relationships,\textsuperscript{133} procreation,\textsuperscript{134} marriage,\textsuperscript{135} contraception,\textsuperscript{136} decisions to beget or bear a child,\textsuperscript{137} and of intimate association,\textsuperscript{138} even a narrower definition of the right to adopt may be sufficient to protect both the rights of adoptive parents and children and withstand judicial scrutiny.

\textsuperscript{129} \textit{Id}. at 1058.
\textsuperscript{130} See \textit{e.g.}, \textit{Id}. at 1066 (discussing the level of specificity used in defining the right at issue in \textit{Bowers v. Harwick}, 478 U.S. 186 (1986) and its effect on the case’s outcome).
\textsuperscript{131} \textit{See Id}. at 1069.
\textsuperscript{132} \textit{Meyer v. Nebraska}, 262 U.S. 390 (1923).
\textsuperscript{133} \textit{Prince v. Massachusetts}, 321 U.S. 158 (1944).
\textsuperscript{135} \textit{Loving v. Virginia}, 388 U.S. 1 (1967).
\textsuperscript{137} \textit{Hardwick}, 478 U.S. at 190.
\textsuperscript{138} \textit{Roberts}, 468 U.S. 609.
No matter how the right is stated, the state may always infringe upon it when the infringement survives a strict scrutiny analysis. Strict scrutiny analysis requires that the action, law, or policy is narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling government interest and that it is the least restrictive means of achieving that interest.\textsuperscript{139} Therefore, necessary infringements could be analyzed on a case-by-case basis that would allow for protection of other competing interests. And no matter how the right is defined, where the interests of a child must be considered, courts should not waive the “best interests” standard as a banner of opposition to adoptive parents’ rights. Due Process jurisprudence must evolve to ensure that the child’s best interests, which are themselves often debated, do not prevent adoptive parents from exercising their own fundamental rights. The Supreme Court itself has admitted that due process history “counsels caution and restraint. But it does not counsel abandonment.”\textsuperscript{140} Some seem to fear that establishing adoption as a fundamental right would set a precedent that neglects the needs of the children. “Children’s interests, not ideologies, should come first; the purpose of adoption is to provide the best possible parents for children, not to provide children for adults who desire to parent them.”\textsuperscript{141} However, there is no reason that, in the context of a strict scrutiny analysis, a court could not still meaningfully consider a child’s best interests.

\textbf{B. Equal Protection for Older AdoptiveParents}

The argument for Equal Protection can take two different paths: first, one can argue that, even if age cannot be given any type of suspect classification, the current laws and practices discriminating against older adoptive parents fail even the low standards of rational review. Second, one can argue that age should be considered a quasi-suspect or suspect classification and should be afforded heightened judicial review. Once given this classification, laws discriminating against older adoptive parents would fail the heightened standard of review. In order to set the stage for these analyses, an examination of the existing precedent is helpful.

\textsuperscript{140}Moore, 431 U.S. at 502.

\textsuperscript{141}National Council for Adoption, \textit{The Rights of Adopted Children Should Be Protected}, in ADOPTION: OPPOSING VIEWPOINTS 82, 82-83 (Mary Williams ed., 2006).

1. Equal Protection Jurisprudence in Same-Sex Adoption

Same-sex couples have raised Constitutional arguments in the context of adoption, and they have seen little success. These challenges provide a basis for ageist discrimination, because same-sex couples have raised many of the same justifications for equal protection of the law. Couples facing discrimination because of their sexual orientation have had to argue against the “best interests” standard as well, and one of the strongest arguments advanced has been that denying them the right to adopt is a denial of their Fourteenth Amendment rights. Currently, only Florida has a statutory ban on both public and private adoptions by “practicing homosexuals.” This law was challenged unsuccessfully in Lofton v. Secretary of Department of Children and Families.

Likely, part of the reason this challenge failed is that sexuality is not considered a suspect or quasi-suspect classification. Because of this, the Eleventh Circuit was able to hold that banning homosexuals from adopting children was rationally related to the legitimate state interest of furthering the best interests of children.

The problematic subjectivity of the “best interest” standard was highlighted in Lofton. Although scholarly literature is in disagreement with this conclusion, the court

---

142 Fla. Stat. § 63.042(3).
143 358 F.3d 804 (11th Cir. 2004).
144 See Johnson v. Johnson, 385 F.3d 503, 532 (5th Cir. 2004); State v. Limon, 122 P.3d 22, 29 (2005).
145 Lofton, 358 F.3d at 818-819.
sided with the argument that homes with married mothers and fathers “provide the stability that marriage affords and the presence of both male and female authority figures, which [the state] considers critical to optimal childhood development and socialization.” In doing so, the court essentially eschewed a substantial body of well-respected research across a variety of fields that believes same-sex parents do not negatively impact their children’s best interests. Additionally, it is important to note that Florida does not ban single adults from adopting, despite the aforementioned “critical” presence of both male and female authority figures. Although national journals on medicine, psychiatry, and social science have all published empirical studies on the impact of same-sex parenting, the “best interest” standard’s subjectivity allowed the court to make its own determination. The court also noted that protecting and furthering “public morality” was a legitimate state interest that would be rationally related to the statute; although the court never explicitly said that homosexuality is immoral, its holding leaves little doubt about the question.

While challenges to this statute and commentary on its irrationality are numerous, the Lofton case aptly demonstrates the difficulty an adoptive parent faces when being 147 See Id. at 819 n. 17 (“We also note that our own recent precedent has unequivocally affirmed the furtherance of public morality as a legitimate state interest. The crafting and safeguarding of public morality has long been an established part of the States' plenary police power to legislate and indisputably is a legitimate government interest under rational basis scrutiny. In fact, the State's interest in public morality is sufficiently substantial to satisfy the government's burden under the more rigorous intermediate level of constitutional scrutiny applicable in some cases.” Internal citations omitted).

measured against the “best interest” standard. Just as certain authorities feel that same-sex households do not foster a child’s best interest, many argue that older parents simply cannot measure up to the best interest standard. Because sexuality does not rise to the level of a suspect classification, the best interest standard allowed the court to craft its own rationale out of the divergent authorities in order to satisfy the rational basis test.

2. Rational Basis Review

The Constitution has also failed to provide a solution for age as a suspect classification, as is exemplified by the Supreme Court’s decision in *Massachusetts Board of Retirement v. Murgia*148. Although the case involved a challenge of mandatory retirement laws, the Court’s reasoning is applicable to age-related claims generally. The plaintiff argued that a state law violated the Equal Protection Clause because of its age-based classification; however, equal protection analysis requires strict scrutiny of a legislative classification only when the classification impermissibly interferes with the exercise of a fundamental right, or when it operates to the peculiar disadvantage of a suspect class. The Court held that the class in question, uniformed police officers over the age of 50, was not a suspect classification and thus not entitled to strict scrutiny. The Court’s reasoning did acknowledge the existence of age-related discrimination, however.

While the treatment of the aged in this Nation has not been wholly free of discrimination, such persons, unlike, say, those who have been discriminated against on the basis of race or national origin, have not experienced a “history of purposeful unequal treatment” or been subjected to unique disabilities on the basis of stereotyped characteristics not truly indicative of their abilities.149

Therefore, the Court’s holding applies to all age-based discrimination claims, and the test for any discriminatory action is merely rational review. Although more than thirty years have passed since the Murgia decision was rendered, the Supreme Court still follows its holding and reasoning.\textsuperscript{150}

---

Because age-related claims are subject to the lowest level of judicial scrutiny, any governmental action must only be rationally related to a legitimate government interest.\textsuperscript{151} This standard is extremely deferential; for example, a statute or action is not invalid under the rational basis test simply because it is not the best possible method or least burdensome method to achieve the state’s objective.\textsuperscript{152} A statutory classification should not be overturned on equal protection grounds unless the varying treatment of different groups or persons is so unrelated to the achievement of any combination of legitimate purposes that the court can only conclude that the legislature's actions are irrational.\textsuperscript{153} The burden is on the challenging party to negative any reasonably conceivable state of facts that could provide a rational basis for the classification.\textsuperscript{154}

Decisions in which a state action fails this deferential standard are extremely rare. One of these very few cases is Romer v. Evans.\textsuperscript{155} In Romer, homosexuals challenged an amendment to the Colorado Constitution that prohibited all legislative, executive, or judicial action designed to protect homosexual persons from discrimination. Because homosexuals have not been granted suspect or quasi-suspect classification, the amendment was tested against rational review. However, in this context, the amendment imposed such a “broad and undifferentiated disability on a single named group,” that the \textsuperscript{153} See Kimel, 528 U.S. at 83-84 (“The rationality commanded by the Equal Protection Clause does not require States to match age distinctions and the legitimate interests they serve with razorlike precision”).

Court held the action invalid.\textsuperscript{156} Further, the breadth of the enactment was so extreme and its proffered justifications so “discontinuous with the reasons offered for it,” that the Court felt its only motivating factor was animus toward homosexuals generally.\textsuperscript{157} The Court pointed out the amendment’s primary flaw in language that could easily be used to describe age bans in adoption: “It is at once too narrow and too broad. It identifies persons by a single trait and then denies them protection across the board.”\textsuperscript{158}

Generally, the state’s interest in adoption proceedings is the expeditious facilitation of adoptions of children into suitable homes.\textsuperscript{159} The state may also have a legitimate interest in protecting the integrity of the adoption process.\textsuperscript{160} Most agencies and legislators justify age limitations placed on adoptive parents as rationally related to these interests; even though limiting the age of adoptive parents may not be the best possible way to achieve the state interest, it may still be valid. Despite the fact that these practices identify persons by a single trait—their age—and then deny them protection because of it, the actions are continually justified as having a “rational” relationship to the facilitation of adoption. Statutes that implicitly or explicitly allow age to be considered under this kind of analysis will probably withstand constitutional scrutiny.

The prevalence of grandparent adoptions and the courts’ preference for these types of placements undermine arguments that age is rationally related to the successful facilitation of adoption, however. Courts’ preference for grandparent adoption stems from the perceived importance of being raised with biological relatives. It may also reflect

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{156} \textit{Id}. at 632.
\item \textsuperscript{157} \textit{Id}.
\item \textsuperscript{158} \textit{Id}. at 633.
\item \textsuperscript{159} See \textit{In re Adoption of Doe}, 2008 UT App 449, 199 P.3d 368; \textit{In re D.D.D.}, 961 So.2d 1216 (La. App. 1 Cir. 2007).
\item \textsuperscript{160} See \textit{In re C.M.D.}, 287 S.W.3d 510 (Tex. App. 2009).
\end{itemize}
reality. In 1998, 3.9 million children were living in homes maintained by their grandparents in either an informal arrangement or because of formal adoption; one million households were run by grandmothers alone. However, these arrangements are often due to major family disruptions or breakdowns, and the needs of both the grandparents and grandchildren may suffer as a result. Children living in grandparent-maintained households were more likely to be without health insurance, to be living below the poverty line, and to be receiving public assistance. Despite the realities of kinship care, professionals still favor it. One survey of 50 state licensors of adoption agencies and 23 professional and child welfare associations and adoption-related organizations found that, in identifying the “best interest of the child” standard, three factors were paramount: “the desire and ability of birth family members to raise the child, the potential or actual parenting ability of those parents, and the option of being raised with biological relatives.”

Further, the federal Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980 codified this preference to a degree: it directs states to give preference to relatives of the adoptive child. The same survey revealed that adoption professionals overwhelmingly supported adoptions by people with physical disabilities. Of 71 people surveyed, only one person felt that physically disabled people should not be allowed to adopt. So adoption professionals agree, at least in theory, that older adults who are biologically related to the adoptee and those with physical disabilities should be allowed to adopt. Nevertheless, a

---

161 SHAPIRO ET AL., supra note 107, at 125.
162 Id. at 126.
163 BABB, supra note 116, at 103.
164 42 U.S.C. § 671(a)(19) (stating that the State shall consider giving preference to an adult relative over a non-related caregiver when determining a placement for a child, provided that the relative caregiver meets all relevant State child protection standards).
165 BABB, supra note 163, at 101; the survey did not ask about attitudes regarding adoption by older non-relatives.
disconnect exists between theory and practice when it is applied to non-relative adults over a certain age.

This may seem contradictory. The facilitation of adoption is a legitimate government interest, and limiting the pool of prospective parents thwarts that state goal. “Any practice that potentially reduces the pool of prospective adoptive parents raises grave concerns.”\textsuperscript{166} Certainly, a simultaneously overly broad and overly narrow policy would seem to decrease the number of applicants and degrade the quality and efficacy of the process. Although it is tenuously arguable that age limitations are rationally related to adoption, it is also arguable that they are fundamentally at odds with the purported state interest. With so many different parties’ interests to consider, courts do not always reach predictable conclusions when considering the state’s and child’s interests. For example, a Wisconsin court held that the fact that an adoption will be in a child's best interests, by itself, does not authorize the court to grant the adoption petition.\textsuperscript{167} If current laws cannot produce predictable or even desirable results, it is possible that the laws no longer bear any rational relationship with the government interests. However, cases like \textit{Romer} are not the norm; most courts will not hesitate to find a rational relationship sufficient to withstand the low level of scrutiny required by the rational basis test.

\textbf{3. Age as a Quasi-Suspect Classification}

Perhaps a stronger argument against the use of rational review is that courts should consider age a quasi-suspect classification. A state may not rely on a classification whose relationship to an asserted goal is so attenuated as to render any distinction \textsuperscript{166} \textit{Adoption of Vito}, 728 N.E.2d 292, 303 (Mass. 2000).

\textsuperscript{167} \textit{Angel Lace M.}, 516 N.W.2d 678 (Wis. 1994).
arbitrary or irrational. Treating the aged and aging as a monolithic group certainly seems irrational. It is time that the courts reconsider the per curium conclusion of the Murgia Court that the aged “have not experienced a ‘history of purposeful unequal treatment’ or been subjected to unique disabilities on the basis of stereotyped characteristics not truly indicative of their abilities.”

Older adults may be subject to discrimination based on scientifically sound findings about a very limited number of generalizations, but there still exists a vast amount of ageist discrimination based on “pure empirically unsupportable prejudice.” Social Security benefits, Medicare, and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act are clear examples of older people being treated unequally, and both the existence of these programs and the policies that underlie them are crucial to recognizing that older Americans are subject to “unique disabilities on the basis of stereotyped characteristics not truly indicative of their abilities.”

Younger adults have treated older adults differently throughout human history, and the justifications for this differential treatment are becoming progressively more divorced from reality. Reconsideration is especially overdue in the adoption context, where courts have allowed kinship adoptions between grandparents and their grandchildren for decades; however, courts and agencies still arbitrarily and irrationally discriminate against non-relative adults who they consider too “old.”

---

169 Murgia, 427 U.S. at 313.
170 See Frederick Schauer, Profiles, Probabilities and Stereotypes 129-30 (2003); see also Phoebe Weaver Williams, Age Discrimination in the Delivery of Health Care Services to Our Elders, 11 Marq. Elder’s Advisor 1 (2009) (discussing pervasive age discrimination in healthcare).
171 These programs’ very existence highlights the paradox of discrimination: discriminating against someone negatively because of a characteristic they cannot control is wrong. But discriminating against someone positively because of those same characteristics is both accepted and desirable. For an overview of the justifications supporting positive age discrimination, see Frolik & McChrystal Barnes, supra note 15, at 32-37.
Further, Justice Marshall’s dissent in Murgia strongly admonished the continued use of a “rigid two-tier model” to analyze age-based equal protection cases, and in the years following Murgia, the Court shifted to accept Justice Marshall’s reasoning for other equal protection claims. In Craig v. Boren, decided only six months after the Murgia decision, the Court established the intermediate level of scrutiny under which the challenged statute must further and important governmental interest and be substantially related to that interest. Maybe more importantly, under the intermediate level of scrutiny, the justification for classifications must be genuine and must not depend on broad generalizations or stereotypes. And yet, these broad generalizations and stereotypes are nearly possible to escape. For instance, although adults age 65 and older comprise 12.7% of the population, less than 2% of prime time television characters are age 65 or older. Advertisements for wrinkle creams, vitamins, diet regimens, hair dyes, plastic surgery, and pharmaceuticals are inescapable, and they perpetuate the aging process as negative, undesirable, and debilitating. And the messages are targeted at progressively younger audiences: marketing focus groups for anti-aging products designed to treat appearance concerns are comprised of people as young as 35 years old. However, their messages seem to be succeeding: the U.S. market for anti-aging products and services in 2009 was estimated at $72 billion. Our constant exposure to ageist stereotypes and condoned age discrimination may be desensitizing American 175 United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 533 (1996) (“The justification must be genuine, not hypothesized or invented post hoc in response to litigation. And it must not rely on overbroad generalizations…”).

---

178 Id.; see also Id. at 41-47 (discussing the “culture of ageism”).
society to the extent and depth of the problem; however, the reality is that our culture’s perception of older people is based almost exclusively on broad, erroneous generalizations and groundless stereotypes.

To date, courts have only applied intermediate scrutiny to sex or gender based classifications, classifications based on illegitimacy, and regulations that have a substantial impact on free speech. The Supreme Court also has cited two other considerations that may be relevant in determining whether statutory provisions pertaining to a particular group are subject to heightened scrutiny. First, if the characteristic that defines the members of the class as a discrete group is immutable or otherwise not within their control, the classification should be subject to heightened scrutiny. As much as society urges us to wish otherwise, aging is clearly an immutable process. The second consideration is whether the group is "a minority or politically powerless." While politicians usually consider older Americans to be a highly coveted bloc of constituents, their political power is not matched by their numbers. The U.S. Census Bureau projected that the number of Americans over the age of 65 would reach 40 million by 2010; that number is only 12.9% of the estimated 2010 population of 310 million. If subject to these considerations that accompany heightened review, age discrimination in adoption would once again fail to find justification. Unfortunately, because states use age as a proxy for stereotypical qualities of older people, and because these distinctions are presumptively rational under the lower level of scrutiny, age-based stereotypes will continue to proliferate via state action. Courts need to recognize both the 180 See e.g., Lyng v. Castillo, 477 US 635, 638 (1986).

---

181 Bowen, 483 U.S. at 602.
myriad of policy reasons and daily-lived realities that support elevating age to a quasi-suspect classification. Courts will then be able to address properly the invidious discrimination against older people in adoptions.

Some positive recent support for this argument can be found in Connecticut’s 2008 holding that sexuality should be considered a quasi-suspect classification. In Kerrigan v. Commissioner of Public Health, the Supreme Court of Connecticut examined at length the arguments about sexuality’s classification—including the Lofton decision.\(^{183}\) In Kerrigan, same-sex couples who were denied marriage licenses brought an action against the state alleging that the denial was unconstitutional under Connecticut’s state constitution.\(^{184}\) Importantly, the Kerrigan court noted the “long history of purposeful and invidious discrimination that continues to manifest itself in society” against gay persons.\(^{185}\) In one excerpt, the court said,

> The characteristic that defines the members of this group—attraction to persons of the same sex—bears no logical relationship to their ability to perform in society, either in familial relations or otherwise as productive citizens. Because sexual orientation is such an essential component of personhood, even if there is some possibility that a person’s sexual preference can be altered, it would be wholly unacceptable for the state to require anyone to do so.

This passage could easily apply to older adoptive parents with minimal editing: the characteristic that defines the group—their “advanced” age—bears no logical relationship to their ability to perform in society, especially in familial relationships. And while the court further conceded that, as a group, gays have made great strides toward equal treatment in recent years, the court felt that as a minority group, they “continue[] to suffer \(^{183}\) Kerrigan, 957 A.2d 407. Although this holding is contrary to the Eleventh Circuit’s decision, the U. S. Supreme Court has yet to address the issue of quasi-suspect or suspect classification for sexuality.

\(^{184}\) Connecticut’s constitution reads slightly differently than the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution: “No person shall be denied the equal protection of the law nor be subjected to segregation or discrimination in the exercise or enjoyment of his or her civil or political rights because of religion, race, color, ancestry, national origin, sex or physical or mental disability.” CONN. CONST. ART. 1, § 20.

\(^{185}\) Kerrigan, 957 A.2d at 432.
the enduring effects of centuries of legally sanctioned discrimination.” Older Americans continue to battle against discrimination in a myriad of contexts, and the existence of the Age Discrimination Act of 1975 and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 stand as glaring reminders of that fact. Although the Kerrigan decision’s precedential value is somewhat limited by its use of the Connecticut state constitution (as opposed to the U. S. Constitution), the analysis is still valuable. The reexamination of the analytical underpinnings that ground suspect classification serves to demonstrate that change is possible—even under the existing legal constraints.

C. Adoption and the State Action Doctrine

Even if a constitutionally based solution to age discrimination in adoption exists, the protections against discrimination found in the Federal Constitution are limited to government actions rather than those of private individuals. While many children who have spent time in the some aspect of state-run child welfare systems are adopted every year, adoptions involving wards of the state do not comprise the majority of placements. Though studies and numbers vary, approximately 15-20% of adoptions are public agency adoptions. When public agencies are involved, state actors and tax dollars bring these adoptions under the aegis of governmental bureaucracy. Adoptions agreements entered into privately between birth parents and adoptive parents may, at least initially, lack any governmental imprimatur. But no matter how the adoption is facilitated, the prospective parents must file an adoption petition for court approval.

186 Id.
188 V. Flango & C. Flango, The Flow of Adoption Information From the States, NATIONAL CENTER FOR STATE COURTS (1994).
Additionally, though state laws vary, many courts require some sort of agency consent or investigation before granting an adoption. Some courts will proceed with an adoption in the face of adverse agency findings, and some courts will proceed in the absence of agency approval altogether.\(^{189}\) When an agency does withhold consent, courts generally look to the reasonableness of the agency’s refusal as an important factor in deciding whether to act in compliance with that agency’s determination.\(^{190}\) The relevant state action in an adoption proceeding is both the “grant of a statutory privilege” and the judicial enforcement of the agency recommendation.\(^{191}\) The interest asserted is “the affirmative right to receive official and public recognition.”\(^{192}\) When states act \textit{in loco parentis} for children in need of protection, constitutional remedies for discrimination are applicable via incorporation. It is beyond question that when the state and its court act as \textit{parens patriae} in these adoption proceedings, any constitutional limitations on discrimination are applicable. It is less clear how independent and agency adoptions fit into the state action doctrine.

When private entities and individuals facilitate adoptions, the court’s involvement is typically limited to approval of the placement. In independent adoptions and those involving private agencies, the opportunity for discrimination against prospective adoptive parents is far more common; this is because agency policies and the wishes of birth parents dictate the choice of applicants.\(^{193}\) This further exacerbates the dichotomy between public adoptions and private adoptions. Infants are often considered the most \(^{189}\) \textit{See In re Harshey}, 318 N.E.2d 544, 548 (Ohio Ct. App. 1974) (refusing consent to an adoption by a “certified agency” does not impair the jurisdiction of the probate court to fully hear and determine an adoption proceeding); \textit{but see In re Adoption of Shawn}, 222 N.W.2d 139 (Wis. 1974).

\(^{191}\) \textit{Lofton}, 358 F.3d at 809 (applying Florida law).

\(^{192}\) \textit{Id.}

\(^{193}\) \textit{MOE}, supra note 116, at 25.
“desirable” of adoptable children; national surveys show that of women actively seeking to adopt a child, 49.2% would prefer a child under the age of two, 56.3% would prefer a single child without siblings, and 55% would prefer a child with no disabilities.\textsuperscript{194} However, infants are typically voluntarily relinquished and adopted through private agencies or independently with the help of private attorneys.\textsuperscript{195} And these agencies and private individuals, relying on ageist stereotypes, rarely consider older applicants to be the most desirable candidates for parenthood. As one researched commented, “Placement agencies have been charged with often subordinating the interests of parents and children alike in maintaining their own authority.”\textsuperscript{196} Therefore, given the proliferation of discriminatory agency standards, the most coveted of adoptable children are also those who are least likely to be matched with an older applicant. This raises the question of whether a court’s approval of an age discriminatory private placement rises to the level of state action.

Even mere court approval of an adoption petition becomes state action under the public function and entanglement exceptions to state action. The public function exception imputes state action onto a private actor in instances of “exercise by a private entity of powers traditionally exclusively reserved to the state.”\textsuperscript{197} Since the state has long served as the arbiter in adoption proceedings, and because it is the court that holds exclusive powers to grant or deny an adoption, states should not be able to avoid the protections of the Constitution by delegating the task to private agencies. “The judicial insistence on reserving to the courts the final word in adoption proceedings does \textsuperscript{194} Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, \textit{supra} note 96.

\textsuperscript{195} \textsc{Groza} & \textsc{Rosenberg}, \textit{supra} note 118, at 3-5.
\textsuperscript{196} \textsc{Aigner}, \textit{supra} note 74, at 95.
\textsuperscript{197} \textit{Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Co.}, 419 U.S. 345, 352 (1974).
represent a major victory for prospective parents whose interests clash with agency arbitrariness and subjectivity.” An even more direct theory is the entanglement exception, in which the Constitution applies to private actions where the government affirmatively authorizes, encourages, or facilitates private conduct that violates the Constitution. The most famous illustration of judicial entanglement is arguably Shelley v. Kraemer, in which the Supreme Court held that courts cannot enforce privately-established racially restrictive covenants. In Kraemer, it was argued that private contractual agreements need not comply with the Constitution and that court enforcement was simply implementing private choices. This is analogous to private adoption placements; courts have construed adoption agreements as contracts with terms “strictly prescribed by state law.” The Kraemer Court held that court enforcement of the restrictive covenants was the equivalent of government facilitation of discrimination.

Shelley v. Kraemer remains controversial because of its expansiveness, and it has only rarely been applied as a basis for finding state action. Later decisions articulated a two-part test to limit the state action exception. In Lugar v. Edmonson Oil Co., the Court held that first, “the deprivation must be caused by the exercise of some right or privilege created by the state, or a rule of conduct imposed by the state.” Although courts have not considered adoption to be a right created by the state, they have deemed it a state-created privilege; therefore, adoption fulfills the first prong of Lugar’s state action test.

---

198 AIGNER, supra note 196, at 94.
200 Does 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 v. State, 993 P.2d 822, 829 (Or. Ct. App. 1999).
201 Kraemer, 334 U.S. at 13.
202 Additionally, it has traditionally been applied in cases of racial discrimination. See e.g., Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296 (1966); Evans v. Abney, 396 U.S. 435 (1970). And in his dissent in Bell v. Maryland, Justice Black states that the reason the restrictive covenants in Shelley were deemed state action was not merely because the state court had acted, but because it had acted to deny petitioners, on the basis of their race, the enjoyment of property rights. Bell v. Maryland, 378 U.S. 226 (1964).
Next, Lugar dictates that the party charged with the deprivation must be a person who may be called a state actor “because he has acted together with or has obtained significant aid from state officials, or because his conduct is otherwise chargeable to the state.”\footnote{Id.} Agencies cannot accomplish adoption without the aid of the court. And ultimately, the approval of a discriminatory placement can only be charged to the judge who makes it. Therefore, adoption is a state action that brings it under the protections of the constitution. Because of this, potential constitutional remedies to age discrimination in adoption proceedings should apply to both public and private agencies and individuals alike.

IV. Searching for a Remedy: Statutory Changes

State laws applicable to adoption proceedings produce little to no uniformity on a national level. While a Uniform Adoption Act does exist, it has only been adopted by eight states.\footnote{Tenembaum, supra note 16.} Further, many states are completely silent on age discrimination against prospective parents.\footnote{See, e.g., ILL. COMP. STAT. 50/1; IOWA CODE § 600.4; MINN. STAT. § 259.22; ARK. CODE ANN. § 9-9-204.} Those state statutes that do address the topic usually do so broadly; Alabama’s statute gives one such example: “No rule or regulation of the Department of Human Resources or any agency shall prevent an adoption by a single person solely because such person is single or shall prevent an adoption \textit{solely because such person is of a certain age}.\footnote{ Ala. Code § 26-10A-5 (1975) (emphasis added).} While the language of the Alabama statute is helpful in thwarting baseless age discrimination, “age” is all too often used as proxy for other perceived limitations that are based upon stereotypes and generalizations. While a 45 year old applicant may not be denied simply because she is 45, that does not mean that a court or agency may not deny her because of attendant characteristics that are often assumed to accompany “advanced” age, including decreased quality of life, decreased health and wellbeing, decreased mobility, decreased lifespan, and so on. Additionally, many adoption codes are silent on their purposes and policy. When a code is silent on age discrimination or underlying policy, or both, agencies and courts are given far too much freedom to unjustifiably discriminate against older adoptive parents.

The first step toward creating a workable statutory scheme is a well articulated purpose that identifies as concretely as possible what the best interests of a child are. The Connecticut adoption code provides a practical example: “The best interests of a child are promoted when the child is part of a loving, supportive and stable family, whether that family is a nuclear, extended, split, blended, single parent, adoptive or foster family.” This statement, though broad, reinforces the notion that a child’s interests are served when he or she is part of a loving and supportive family, regardless of the exact characteristics of each family member. Despite its generality, a statement such as this helps support the argument that age discrimination is not rationally related to the amount of love or support a child will receive. Coupled with language similar to that in the Alabama statute, the laws will require a much more rigorous analysis of any age-based adoption decisions.

Another step toward creating an effective adoption statute is the inclusion of a framework that either prohibits private agencies from instituting arbitrary age bans or that strongly encourages them not to include such bans. This type of incentivizing has been achieved in the context of race through the Interethnic Adoption Provisions of the Small

---

208 CONN. GEN. STAT. § 45a-727a(3).
Business Job Protection Act.\textsuperscript{209} When this bill amended the Multiethnic Placement Act, it subjected states to penalties for noncompliance, including reductions in federal funding of up to 5\% by the Secretary of State.\textsuperscript{210} However, the penalty for private agencies is dire: any entity in a state that receives federal funds and that violates the Act must remit to the Secretary \textit{all} funds that it received during that year.\textsuperscript{211} A similar type of penalty should be enacted in the context of age discrimination, and states and agencies that allow discrimination to continue should expect there to be consequences. While some portion of private adoption agencies may be able to continue to render services despite any financial penalties, the incentive to abandon age restrictions would be substantial.

v. Conclusion

Age discrimination in adoption exists, and courts condone it by approving placements that are dictated by private discriminatory ideologies. While those who deny adoptions on the basis of age may believe they are serving the best interests of the child, both prospective adoptive parents and children in need of a home are harmed by the denial. Treating older adults as a homogenous group of incapable caregivers relies on incorrect stereotypes that marginalize the abilities and the potential of a vast group of individuals. Additionally, the realities of the 20\textsuperscript{th} century mean that both the quality and length of life are increasing; instead of relegating older adults to the use of technologies like ART in order to become parents, adoption agencies, courts, and society need to embrace older adults as adoptive parents.

In order to achieve this result on a national level, prospective adoptive parents must either push for a change in federal mandates to include age as a prohibited basis on which to deny an adoption, or they must look to the Constitution for an as-yet untested solution. Although adoption may never be considered a fundamental right, and for valid reasons, older adults should be granted status as a quasi-suspect class. Older adults have “experienced a history of purposeful unequal treatment” in the adoption industry, and this treatment has led to “unique disabilities on the basis of stereotyped characteristics not truly indicative of their abilities.” Once older adoptive parents are characterized as a quasi-suspect class, discriminatory adoption actions can be scrutinized under a heightened level of scrutiny. Discriminatory laws and practices will not be able to survive intermediate judicial scrutiny, because age, standing alone, is not substantially related to neither an adoptive child’s best interests nor the state’s interest in facilitating adoption. Additionally, state and federal legislators much consider reworking the existing statutory schemes and implementing financial penalties for continued discrimination. Only then will adoption agencies, both public and private, be forced to acknowledge older adults as capable and competent prospective parents for children in need.

\textsuperscript{209}\textit{Id.}
\textsuperscript{210}\textit{Id.}
\textsuperscript{211}\textit{Id.}

---

212 Murgia, 427 U.S. at 313.