1999

Literature, Politics, and the Law: On Blacksmiths, Tailors and the Demolition of Houses

Shulamit Almog, University of Haifa

Available at: https://works.bepress.com/shulamit_almog1/49/
January 1999

Literature, Politics, and the Law: On Blacksmiths, Tailors and the Demolition of Houses
In 1962, Haim H. Cohn, at the time the Attorney General of the State of Israel, approached Shmuel Yosef Agnon and asked him to contribute to a collection of articles being prepared to commemorate the seventy-fifth birthday of Pinhas Rosen, then Minister of Justice. Agnon, who had not as yet been awarded the Nobel Prize but was nevertheless the most widely acclaimed living author in Israel, agreed, and the same year contributed a collation consisting of seventeen short stories, entitled “A Small Book of Tales.” One of the stories in this collation is The Kilikov Trial or a Life for a Life, which is quoted here almost in full. I have still not concluded all my praise for Kilikov, for not only its worldly qualities alone is Kilikov to be extolled, but it is to be praised for the judicial decisions of its judges. What are the decisions of its judges? It is told that once, during the Polish wars, a gentile killed his friend in Kilikov. Maliciously or accidentally? From the judgment it emerges that he was killed with malice. He was put in jail and convicted of killing, as a man is convicted when murdering another with malice.

When the murderer was taken out to be hanged it was remembered that he was a blacksmith by profession and that in all Kilikov there was no other blacksmith. And indeed a city cannot cope without a blacksmith, who serves the needs of many.

They investigated and found that in the city there were two tailors but that they could make do with one. The judges reconvened and said: instead of the blacksmith we shall hang one tailor and we shall let the blacksmith live, for the city cannot manage without a blacksmith but one tailor will suffice.

They acquitted the blacksmith and brought him back from the hangman’s house and in his stead they hanged one of the two tailors living in the city. Which of the two I do not know, but I do know a poem which the wise man Mordechai Ben David Starlisker, known as Marbad Set, composed about it, the conclusion of which hints at its beginning:
II. The Determination of Houses in Pennsylvania

In Pennsylvania, the process of determining houses is based on the principle of fair division, with emphasis on equity and efficiency. The determination is typically conducted by a qualified professional, such as an arbitrator or mediator, who is impartial and knowledgeable in the field.

The process begins with the identification of the houses or properties to be determined. This is followed by an assessment of the market value of each property. The next step involves the negotiation phase, where the parties attempt to reach an agreement on the division of the properties.

If an agreement cannot be reached, the matter is typically referred to an arbitrator or mediator for a decision. The arbitrator or mediator will consider the evidence presented and render a decision that is fair and equitable to both parties.

The determination process is designed to be efficient and fair, ensuring that the interests of all parties are considered and protected. It is a crucial element in the resolution of disputes over the division of properties, ensuring that the process is transparent and just.
be the Major Commander and confirm that he acted within his powers; however, this statement is clear. On the face of it, it appears to support the position of the Major Commander, but not the position of the President or the Director. What is the situation at the time of the previous construction of the Main Building? The original plans show the area as a large open space with no boundaries. If this area were to be used for any purpose, it would require additional construction. This suggests that the President and the Director were not aware of the intent to construct a building in this area. The original plans do not provide any information about the construction of a building in this area. Therefore, it is not possible to confirm the statement that the President and the Director provided.
This is an understandable phenomenon. Judges are incapable of delivering impartial judgments. If you were to ask a "neutral" judge, he would say that he is fair and open to all cases. However, the process of rating judges is often done by complex formulas which consider various factors including the judge's past decisions. Judges are human and are affected by their personal experiences and biases. The rating system is designed to identify the best judges, but it is not perfect. It can be manipulated and is often criticized for favoring certain judges. In conclusion, the rating system is not an objective measure of a judge's performance. It is a tool used to try to improve the system, but it has its limitations.
The significance of a community and the importance placed on the organization of the story in the context of justice and the consequences of actions taken.

In the story, the individuals, as part of the community, engage in acts of omission or commission, which contribute to the overall narrative. The community is depicted as a dynamic entity where individual actions are part of a larger whole. The community landscape is one of interdependence, where the actions of one member affect the others.

The community is also portrayed as a place of conflict and cooperation, where individual rights and collective responsibilities are balanced. This balance is crucial in maintaining the stability of the community and ensuring the well-being of its members.

The community's structure and function are essential in shaping the story's outcome. The community's role in the story is not merely passive; it is active, influencing the actions and decisions of the individuals involved. The community's influence extends beyond the narrative, affecting the readers' perceptions and understanding of the story.

In conclusion, the community's role in the story underscores the importance of collective responsibility and the interconnectedness of individual actions. The community's function is not merely a backdrop but a crucial element in the story's development, shaping the course of events and the resolution of conflicts.

The story of the community, as depicted in this narrative, serves as a reminder of the significance of collective action and the role of community in shaping individual and societal outcomes.
There are the dilemma choices which are made by Justice Chatham in this judge's book of a decision which the accused officer of the accused member of the accused preparatory of examination. The accused officer of the accused preparatory of examination are made by Justice Chatham in this judge's book.
Works Cited

Miron, Dan. Histaklut be-ravmekher. Tel Aviv: ha-Kibuts ha-me’uha, 1996.