Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

Susannah W Pollvogt, University of Denver

Available at: https://works.bepress.com/susannah_pollvogt/7/
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

Susannah W. Pollvogt†

† Adjunct Faculty, University of Denver Sturm College of Law. J.D. Yale Law School, 1998. B.A. Williams College, 1994. Thanks to Erwin Chemerinsky, Patience Crowder, William Eskridge, Christopher Lasch, Kevin Lynch, Catherine Smith, Michael Sousa, Robin Sterling, and Lindsey Webb for comments and feedback on earlier drafts. Special thanks to my outstanding research assistants, Casey Giltner, Sara Hildebrand and Conrad Imel.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

Abstract

Suspect classification analysis and the associated tiers of scrutiny framework are the primary doctrinal features of contemporary equal protection jurisprudence. How plaintiffs fare under these twin doctrines determines the ultimate fate of their equal protection claims. But neither doctrine finds firm footing in precedent or theory. Rather, a close examination of the United States Supreme Court’s equal protection jurisprudence reveals these doctrines as historically contingent and lacking in any principled justification. But rather than disregard the contributions of these cases altogether, this Article mines that same body of law not for the discrete doctrinal mechanisms developed in each case, but for the transcendent equal protection values expressed in their development. It then proposes a doctrinal intervention—based in the Court’s precedent but as of yet unacknowledged—that cures the primary shortcomings of contemporary equal protection jurisprudence.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

I. Introduction

Close-minded they were—as every age is, including our own, with regard to matters it cannot guess, because it simply does not consider them debatable.\(^1\)

---

\(^1\) United States v. Virginia, 516 U.S. 515, 566-67 (1996) (Scalia, J., dissenting). Here, Justice Scalia was acknowledging the persistence of prejudice, which always takes new forms for new generations. He made this assertion toward the larger point that our democratic system is well equipped to eventually root out
The central challenge of equal protection jurisprudence is not to account for those prejudices that are already apparent to us (the blunt and obvious biases of our forefathers), but for those prejudices that today seem natural, familiar, and fair.\textsuperscript{2}

these prejudices and the associated oppression of disfavored social groups. This Article starts from the same initial premise—that biases are ever-present and evolving, such that we are generally unaware of the prejudices of our own time—but contends that it is precisely the role of the judiciary to balance majoritarian complacency and prevent unfair prejudices from being enshrined in and perpetuated by the public laws.

It is now commonplace to condemn slavery and segregation—a rhetorical practice presumably intended to bind Americans ever more closely to principles of equality. But repeated condemnation of slavery and segregation may have just the
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

Stated another way, the central challenge of equal protection opposite effect. We have demonized subordinating practices of the past to such a degree that condemning such practices may instead function to exonerate practices contested in the present, none of which look so unremittingly “evil” by contrast.

The Equal Protection Clause should protect against discrimination based upon immutable characteristics regardless of whether any case involving such discrimination has previously been litigated or whether that particular form of discrimination has become prevalent only recently. In other words, the clause should respond to more than history; it must be strong enough to protect against novel forms of discrimination that may arise in the future.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

jurisprudence is to prevent another Plessy v. Ferguson,\(^3\) or another Bowers v. Hardwick\(^4\)—decisions soaked in the prejudices of their time and entirely devoid of any cognitive or doctrinal mechanism to correct the unreflective, prejudicial impulse. In the passage quoted above, Justice Scalia accepts capitulation to contemporary prejudices as inevitable. This Article contends that we can aspire to more.

The Court has, in fact, devised mechanisms that are supposed to be particularly adept at rooting out unfair

---

\(^3\) Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896). In Plessy (discussed at length below), the United States Supreme Court held that racial segregation on railroad cars was permissible under the now-infamous “separate but equal” doctrine.

\(^4\) Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986). Bowers is not discussed at length here because it is not a recognized equal protection case. But Bowers may nonetheless be compared to Plessy in that it represents an instance of the Court relying on nothing more than subjective and unexamined social judgments in affirming a discriminatory law.
prejudices: suspect classification analysis and heightened scrutiny.

While the Court has hardly been consistent in articulating or applying suspect classification analysis, the basic thrust of the analysis is to identify those social groups against whom discrimination is presumptively problematic, such that the Court needs to pay closer attention to laws distributing rights and benefits along those social group lines. Thus, suspect classification analysis asks (with quite a bit of variation) if a particular social group (1) constitutes a discrete and insular minority; (2) has suffered a history of discrimination; (3) is politically powerless; (4) is defined by an immutable trait; and (5) is defined by a trait that is generally irrelevant to one’s ability to function in society. If the Court answers “yes” to some portion of these questions, then it will deem that group a suspect or quasi-suspect class, and will apply more searching scrutiny to laws discriminating against that group. These twin doctrines are supposed to identify and protect against laws that enforce invidious discrimination.

---

But, as demonstrated below, these doctrinal mechanisms are useful (and indeed, are invoked) only in cases where the prejudice at issue has already been recognized and understood as unfair. They do nothing to force identification of unrecognized and evolving (that is, contemporary) prejudices. While heightened scrutiny is intended to force reasoned analysis, the vast majority of cases are subject to deferential rational basis review—a level of scrutiny that affirmatively shuns reasoned analysis in the name of federalism and separation of powers. Thus, it is questionable what work heightened scrutiny is really doing for the Court when it evaluates equal protection claims.

The question posed by the Article is this: are the doctrinal structures of modern equal protection analysis equipped for the task of identifying and addressing contemporary prejudices? The 6 See Miss. Univ. for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 725 (1988) (describing the purpose of heightened scrutiny as "is to assure that the validity of a classification is determined through reasoned analysis").

---

initial answer is “no.” But there is promise latent in the largely unexamined transcendent values of the Court’s equal protection jurisprudence—values this Article seeks to unearth and solidify in doctrinal form.

* * *

A brief background in equal protection jurisprudence provides a necessary foundation for the contentions of this Article. Suspect classification analysis and the tiers of scrutiny framework are the primary doctrinal features of modern equal protection jurisprudence, and are the primary mechanisms for filtering equal protection claims. Ultimately, the fate of any given equal protection claim depends largely on the level of scrutiny assigned to review the challenged law. Levels of scrutiny, in turn, come in essentially two varieties: rational basis review and heightened scrutiny.

---

8 Id. at 719-21.
Rational basis review is the default level of scrutiny in equal protection cases. Where a law implicates neither a suspect classification nor a fundamental right, the Court will apply rational basis review, which asks only whether the discriminatory classification employed by the challenged law is rationally related to a legitimate governmental interest. Unsurprisingly, plaintiffs overwhelmingly lose under this standard.

9 Id. at 723.

11 CHEMERINSKY, supra note 7, at 724 (concluding that “it is rare for the Supreme Court to find that a law fails the rational basis test” based upon the fact that a challenger to a law analyzed under the rational basis test has the burden of proving that there is no rational basis for the law and that a law will be upheld under that test if there is any conceivable legitimate purpose for the law, even if that was not the government’s actual purpose in enacting the law.); but see Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996), an important case in which Amendment 2 to the Colorado
The term “heightened scrutiny” refers to both strict scrutiny and intermediate scrutiny, with strict scrutiny being the more demanding of the two standards. The Court applies strict scrutiny in reviewing laws that implicate a suspect classification or a fundamental right, while the Court applies intermediate scrutiny to cases involving so-called quasi-suspect classifications. The two standards are formulated differently: suspect classification requires that the discriminatory classification be necessary to accomplish a compelling state interest; intermediate scrutiny requires that the discriminatory classification be substantially related to an important state interest. Minor semantic distinctions alike, the two forms of heightened scrutiny are more alike than different, in that a Constitution was struck down as unconstitutional under rational basis review.

plaintiff’s chances of prevailing are much greater under either of these forms of heightened review, as compared to deferential rational basis review.15

Most significantly, under either form of heightened scrutiny, the burden is on the government to provide a real and credible justification for the discriminatory law, and the justification must be weighty.16 By contrast, under rational basis review, the burden is on the plaintiff to prove the absence of any 16 See Miss. Univ. for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 724 (1982) (requiring that government action based on sex, to withstand intermediate scrutiny, must establish an “exceedingly persuasive” justification); Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499 (2005) (government bears the burden of proving that a law classifying on the basis of race, under strict scrutiny, is narrowly tailored to further a compelling government interest).

Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

legitimate basis for the law, and legitimate state interests can be relatively trivial.\textsuperscript{17} In addition, under rational basis review, the Court is free to imagine justifications for the law, regardless of whether the legislature actually considered or advanced those justifications.\textsuperscript{18} For these reasons, rational basis review has been criticized as bordering on meaningless.\textsuperscript{19}

Understandably, equal protection plaintiffs are eager to have some form of heightened scrutiny applied to their claims.

\textsuperscript{17} See Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26, 32 (1954) (“public safety, public health, morality, peace and quiet, law and order – these are some of the more conspicuous examples of the traditional application of the police power to municipal affairs. Yet they merely illustrate the scope of the power and do not delimit it.”).

\textsuperscript{18} See McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 426 (1961) (a law upheld under rational basis if “any state of facts reasonably may be conceived to justify its discrimination).

And suspect classification\textsuperscript{20} analysis is the gatekeeper to heightened scrutiny.\textsuperscript{21} As a result, equal protection plaintiffs \textsuperscript{20} Proving that the challenged law burdens a fundamental right is an alternative means to achieving strict scrutiny, City of Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Ctr., 473 U.S. 432, 440 (1985), this Article is focused exclusively on the suspect classification prong of the heightened scrutiny analysis.

\textsuperscript{21} Described in greater length below, suspect classification analysis essentially asks whether the group targeted by a law has been historically subjected to unfair prejudice, such that laws targeting the group are more likely to be motivated by prejudice, and should be subject to more rigorous judicial scrutiny as a result. See Marcy Strauss, \textit{Reevaluating Suspect Classifications}, \textit{Seattle U. L. Rev.} 135, 138 (2011) ("There is at least superficial consensus for the basic premise of equal protection law: courts should be skeptical of—and should scrutinize more carefully—classifications involving politically powerless groups that have historically been discriminated against."). Thus, the focus of suspect classification analysis is on the nature (some would say
frequently argue that the social group to which they belong ought to be considered a suspect classification.\textsuperscript{22}

Suspect classification analysis and the tiers of scrutiny framework have been around for a quite a while, and have come to seem inevitable features of equal protection law.\textsuperscript{23} Indeed, litigants have little incentive to attempt to challenge these worthiness) of the group being discriminated against, rather than on the nature of the government discrimination.

\textsuperscript{22} See, \textit{e.g.}, Perry v. Schwarzenegger, 704 F. Supp. 2d 921 (N.D. Cal. 2001) (analyzing argument that heightened scrutiny should be applied to law that classifies on basis of sexual orientation); \textit{see also} William N. Eskridge, Jr., \textit{Is Political Powerlessness a Requirement for Heightened Equal Protection Scrutiny?}, 50 Washburn L.J. 1 (suggesting that those belonging to other social groups, such as transgender and intersex individuals, may similarly seek heightened review of laws classifying on the basis of gender or gender expression).

\textsuperscript{23} See Susannah Pollvogt, \textit{Unconstitutional Animus}, 81 Fordham L. Rev. 887, 895 (2012) (asserting that the tiers-of-scrutiny framework has been developing at least since the 1960s).
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

doctrinal structures;\textsuperscript{24} instead, their best approach is to make arguments within them.\textsuperscript{25} And while myriad scholars have parsed, rationalized, and criticized these doctrinal structures, in some ways, the volume of critique has added to the sense that those structures are inevitable and fixed.\textsuperscript{26}

But, upon closer examination, we can see that the evolution of suspect classification analysis and the tiers of scrutiny framework was very much historically contingent and arguably irrational. From its unholy origins to its fitful evolution, suspect classification analysis is more Frankenstein's monster \textsuperscript{24} See Suzanne B. Goldberg, \textit{Equality Without Tiers}, 77 S. Cal. L. Rev. 481, 524 (2004) (noting that “litigators of equal protection cases before the Court have not generally pressed for anything other than standard application of the three tiers”).

\textsuperscript{25} See Mario Barnes & Irwin Chemerinsky, \textit{The Once and Future Equal Protection Doctrine?}, 43 Conn. L. Rev. 1059, 1079-80 (2011).

\textsuperscript{26} \textit{Id.} at 1087-88.
than a creature of rational construction. And, indeed, there is an emerging consensus that suspect classification analysis and the tiers of scrutiny framework are broken, in need of repair if not complete abandonment.

This Article contends that, despite the many flaws in the whole of equal protection doctrine, including suspect classification analysis, it is possible to step back and read the Court’s seminal suspect classification cases not for the specific doctrinal mechanisms each introduces, but for evidence of transcendent equal protection values that can provide clear guidance in revising existing doctrinal mechanisms to meet the challenges facing this body of law. Specifically, this revived doctrine can cure the most serious ills of equal protection

27 Mary W. Shelly, FRANKENSTEIN; OR THE MODERN PROMETHEUS (1823); David J. Skal, SCREAMS OF REASON: MAD SCIENCE AND MODERN CULTURE, 33 (1998) (observing that “[t]he Frankenstein myth had its origins in the nineteenth-century Romantic rebellion against scientific rationalism”).

28 See, e.g., Strauss, supra note 21.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

jurisprudence: meaningless rational basis review, the symmetry problem, and the Court’s resistance to expanding categorical heightened scrutiny review. Furthermore, such a doctrinal mechanism can be assembled from what we already 29 See Goldberg, supra note 24, at 482 (Application of the rational basis standard has “waver[ed] between its typical deference to government decisionmaking and the occasional insistence on meaningful review.” 482); Kenji Yoshino, The New Equal Protection, 124 Harv. L. Rev. 747, 756 (2011) (“The words ‘scrutiny’ and ‘review’ suggest an examination rather than a result. Yet in this jurisprudence, looks can kill.”).

30 Straus, supra note 21, at 168-69. Strauss asserts that the Court’s symmetry in applying strict scrutiny to protect, for example, whites as well as blacks, or men as well as women, constitutes a rejection of the criteria altogether. Id.

31 Yoshino, supra note 29, at 748. Yoshino observed that the Court has failed to acknowledge new suspect classes, and limited protection of existing classes, due to pluralism anxiety. Id. Yoshino further claims that as it related to Equal Protection, the cannon of heightened scrutiny is “closed.” Id. at 757.
have before us in terms of Supreme Court precedent, without disavowing what has come before, but also without being unduly constrained by past missteps.

To elaborate on this thesis, Part II of the Article re-tells the story of suspect classification analysis in a way that denaturalizes its evolution and questions its inevitability. Part III analyzes the exiting critiques of suspect classification analysis, which attempt to rationalize, explain, or disassemble the framework, but which stop short of questioning its fundamental legitimacy. Part IV exposes deeper problems with these doctrinal frameworks, and then performs an alternative reading of the precedent that traces the transcendent equal protection values submerged within the piecemeal development of suspect classification analysis. Part IV goes on to present an alternative doctrinal framework that expresses these values. Part V concludes.

II. MISSTEPS

From one perspective, contemporary equal protection jurisprudence, characterized by suspect classification analysis and the tiers of scrutiny framework, begins and ends with Plessy
v. Ferguson.\textsuperscript{32} It begins there because \textit{Plessy} demonstrates the abject failure of deferential rational basis review—that is, of an unreflective “reasonableness” standard—in detecting contemporary prejudices. That the Court later developed more rigorous forms of scrutiny to be applied when there was reason to believe prejudice was afoot is an implicit admission of the profound failure of rational basis review. And yet the Court applies heightened scrutiny in very few cases, and continues to apply deferential rational basis review—the standard employed in \textit{Plessy}—to the remainder. In this way contemporary equal protection jurisprudence ends with \textit{Plessy}, because the Court continues to apply \textit{Plessy}-like rational basis review to the vast majority of equal protection claims.

This Section discusses the failure of rationality as manifest in \textit{Plessy}, and the Court's initial efforts to discern and justify different levels of judicial scrutiny for different types of equal protection claims as a response to that failure. It then examines suspect classification analysis’ sudden and brief rise to fame.

\textsuperscript{32} \textit{Plessy} v. \textit{Ferguson}, 163 U.S. 537 (1896).
It further describes how, contrary to what one might expect, the Court did not articulate a comprehensive suspect classification analysis in the context of race discrimination. Indeed, although race is the paradigmatic suspect classification, the reasons for designating it so have never been fully examined or articulated by the Court. Instead, we must turn to the Court’s awkward and pained recognition of quasi-suspect classifications, as well as its decisions rejecting claims to suspect classification status, to better understand the normative principles underlying the concept.

A. Plessy v. Ferguson and the Failure of Rationality

\textit{Plessy} is best known for establishing the “separate but equal” doctrine that was later repudiated by the Court in \textit{Brown}

\begin{footnote}{33 See, \textit{e.g.,} Ian Haney Lopez & Michael C. Olivas, \textit{Jim Crow, Mexican Americans, and the Anti-Subordination Constitution: The Story of Hernandez v. Texas, in Race Law Stories} 273, 291 (Devon W. Carbado & Rachel F. Moran eds., 2008) (referring to African Americans as the “quintessential constitutional out-group).}

Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

v. Board of Education.\textsuperscript{34} Plessy is also well known for Justice Harlan’s dissent, in which he famously claimed “[o]ur Constitution is color-blind”\textsuperscript{35}—a turn of phrase that some have taken as articulating a post-race democratic ideal, and that others have taken as a component of a deeply racist jurisprudential philosophy.\textsuperscript{36}

Plessy is perhaps less well known for the precise reasoning the Court employed to reach its conclusion, including its reliance on a prototype of traditional deferential rational basis review. The facts of Plessy are familiar. At issue was a Louisiana state law requiring “all railway companies carrying passengers in their coaches in this state to provide equal but separate accommodations for the white and colored races,” although the law generously excepted “nurses attending children of the other race.” The law further required railway personnel to enforce this segregation. Homer Plessy, who was “seven-eighths Caucasian and one-eighth African, such that the mixture of colored blood was not discernable in him,” challenged the law by claiming a seat in the car reserved for whites.

\textsuperscript{35} Plessy, 163 U.S. at 559 (Harlan, J., dissenting).

The Court interpreted the scope of the Equal Protection Clause very narrowly, in particular distinguishing between equality in the legal versus social spheres. The Court further 37 Plessy, 163 U.S. at 540-41.

38 Id. at 541.
39 Id.
40 Id. at 544.

The object of the amendment was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law, but, in the nature of things, it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based upon color, or to enforce social, as distinguished from political, equality, or a noted that racial segregation within the social sphere was firmly within the police power.\textsuperscript{41} This type of routine, presumptively permissible segregation included segregation in schools and anti-miscegenation laws.\textsuperscript{42} The Court cited abundant precedent approving of such arrangements.\textsuperscript{43}

\textit{Id.} Reva Siegel has detailed the conceptual underpinnings of the substantive reasoning in the case. \textit{See} Siegel, \textit{supra} note 2, at 1126-27.

\textsuperscript{41} \textit{Plessy}, 163 U.S. at 544 ("Laws permitting, and even requiring, their separation in places where they are liable to be brought into contact . . . . have been generally, if not universally, recognized as within the competency of the state legislatures in the exercise of their police power.).

\textsuperscript{42} \textit{Id.} at 545.

\textsuperscript{43} The Court's deference to those matters within the police power is significant. Seventy-one years later, in \textit{Loving v. Virginia}, the Court would recognize that the mere fact that an area of regulation was traditionally within the police power did
Thus, the Plessy Court articulated the foundations of judicial deference to legislative action that still guide the Court today. As a general proposition, the Court will not involve itself in matters within the states’ police power. This expresses a commitment to principles of both federalism and separation of powers. Those commitments are expressed through application of deferential rational basis review—that is, the Court declaring that it will go no further than to ask whether a particular state law is “reasonable.”

The Court’s application of this standard to the racial segregation challenged in Plessy clearly demonstrates that such deferential review is incapable of identifying and addressing contemporary prejudices. Specifically, Homer Plessy argued that if the Court permitted laws segregating passengers in railroad cars, then states would be free to pass legislation mandating not immunize laws from equal protection review. See Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 7 (1967). But at the time of Plessy there was a fundamentally different understanding of the relationship between state power and the mandate of the Equal Protection Clause.

---

pervasive markers of segregation throughout social intercourse (a classic “slippery slope” argument).\textsuperscript{44} The Court had little \textsuperscript{44} \textit{Plessy}, 163 U.S. at 549.

[I]t is also suggested by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error that the same argument that will justify the state legislature in requiring railways to provide separate accommodations for the two races will also authorize them to require separate cars to be provided for people whose hair is of a certain color, or who are aliens, or who belong to certain nationalities, or to enact laws requiring colored people to walk upon one side of the street and white people upon the other, or requiring white men’s houses to be painted white and colored men’s black, or their vehicles or business signs to be of different colors, upon the theory that one side of the street is as good as the other, or that a house or vehicle of one color is as good as one of another color.

\textit{Id.} at 549-50.
difficulty responding to this contention: "The reply to all this is that every exercise of the police power must be reasonable, and extend only to such laws as are enacted in good faith for the promotion for the public good, and not for the annoyance or oppression of a particular class."\textsuperscript{45} The Court was confident in its ability to separate reasonable regulations from measures designed to oppress. In retrospect, this confidence was unwarranted.

\textit{Plessy} has been criticized as "wrong the day it was decided"\textsuperscript{46} and an expression of a morally bankrupt philosophy: that it was permissible in our democracy for a dominant group to harness the public laws toward the end of controlling the social circumstances of a subordinate group.\textsuperscript{47} But another way of viewing \textit{Plessy} is as a failure of judicial process—specifically, the failure to develop a legal test that would force the members of the Court to look beyond what seemed familiar and reasonable, and instead engage in a critical analysis of whether the law at issue violated the central directive of the Equal Protection Clause.

\textsuperscript{45} \textit{Id.} at 550.

\textsuperscript{47} \textit{Id.}

From this perspective, Plessy, more than any other case (certainly more than Carolene Products[^48]), explains why the Court would ultimately turn to varying levels of scrutiny in an effort to produce more just decisions: because we are not the rational beings we suppose ourselves to be. Across-the-board deference to legislative judgments, tested against only a standard of “reasonableness,” did not give meaning to equal protection guarantees in Plessy, nor did it produce just results. Stated another way, deferential rational basis review provides no resistance to the logic of contemporary prejudice. It is not a reason-forcing analysis. But the Court's response to this realization was not, as it might have been, to abandon rational basis review altogether in evaluating facially discriminatory laws. Rather, over several decades, the Court set about a tenuous process of discerning between groups that deserved more judicial protection versus those that did not. The groups that did not deserved such protection would continue to be subject to Plessy-style rational basis review.

[^48]: United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938). As discussed below, the Court’s decision in Carolene Products is widely credited as the origin of suspect classification analysis and the tiers of scrutiny framework.

---

49 See Kenji Yoshino, Covering 178-81 (2006) (discussing the concept of “reason-forcing conversations”). Further, the Court does not always engage in the entire rational basis review. “[T]he standard’s emphasis on deference at times leads courts to skip over the required step of evaluating the link between that permissible goal and the government action.” Goldberg, supra note 24, at 490. In other words, in the spirit of deference, once a court analyzes the sufficiency of the governmental purpose, it fails to conduct any tailoring analysis whatsoever.
B. Carolene Products and Its Surprising Progeny

It was not the Court’s concise and clear-headed decision in Brown v. Board of Education\(^50\) that redeemed the sins of Plessy. Of course Brown corrected Plessy on the level of substantive doctrine—rejecting the theory that “separate” could be “equal” in any meaningful sense—but it did not correct the Plessy Court’s failures of judicial epistemology—that is, failures in the Court’s way of knowing or identifying the presence of invidious discrimination. Notably, Brown did not engage in suspect classification analysis or apply any form of heightened scrutiny. Rather, Brown is more properly understood as representing a turning point in social consensus and “scientific understanding” about race, race segregation, and segregation’s symbolic and social effects.\(^51\) Stated another way, what changed between \(^{50}\) 347 U.S. 483 (1954).

\(^{51}\) Suzanne Goldberg notes that “the suspect classification tier gained its early foothold at a time when a majority of the Court and significant sectors of society at large had begun to accept as a matter of course that racial classifications typically lacked legitimacy.” Goldberg, supra note 24, at 526.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

`Plessy` and `Brown` was the social consensus about the permissibility of pervasive race segregation. The Court’s doctrinal mechanisms for detecting the presence of invidious discrimination were not examined or changed.

Rather than being based in `Brown` or any of the seminal race cases, the most prominent doctrinal features of contemporary equal protection jurisprudence—suspect classification analysis and the tiers of scrutiny—trace their intellectual heritage back to a law-clerk-drafted\(^{52}\) footnote in a six-page decision about filled milk.\(^{53}\) What is filled milk, you ask, and why is it important to equal protection law? Filled milk is an insidious substance—starting out as skim milk to which some non-milk oil or fat is added so as to mimic higher quality milk or \(^{52}\) See Gerald Lebovitz, et al., Ethical Judicial Opinion Writing, 21 GEO. J. LEGAL ETHICS 237, 304 (2008) (“Justice Harlan Fiske Stone allowed his law clerk, Louis Lusky, to write the most significant footnote in Supreme Court history.”).

\(^{53}\) See also United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 575 (1996) (attributing “the genesis of heightened standards of judicial review” to `Carolene Products` footnote four).
cream. Indeed, this substance was viewed as so insidious that Congress enacted the Filled Milk Act of 1923 in an attempt to stem its evils. What does filled milk have to do with the Equal Protection Clause? Nothing, really, except that the producers of said unnatural product argued that other unnatural products were being given preferential treatment, and that this constituted an unjustified discrimination.\(^{54}\)

Despite the focus on discrimination, the plaintiffs did not seriously advance an equal protection claim per se. Still, in

\(^{54}\) See United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 151 (1938):

Appellee raises no valid objection to the present statute by arguing that its prohibition has not been extended to oleomargarine or other butter substitutes in which vegetable fats or oils are substituted for butter fat. The Fifth Amendment has no Equal Protection Clause, and even that of the Fourteenth Amendment applicable only to the states, does not compel their Legislatures to prohibit all like evils, or none.
responding to the plaintiffs’ non-argument, the Court, in dicta, briefly sketched out a basis for subjecting certain types of discrimination to greater scrutiny than the deferential standard typically applied in cases of discrimination in the commercial context.

First, the Court set out the default standard for deferential rational basis review, which it emphasized was the applicable standard for cases involving commercial transactions:

The existence of facts supporting the legislative judgment is to be presumed, for regulatory legislation affecting ordinary commercial transactions is not to be pronounced unconstitutional unless in the light of the facts made known or assumed it is of such a character as to preclude the assumption that it rests on some rational basis within the knowledge and experience of the legislators.

---

56 Carolene Products, 304 U.S. at 151.
One component of this standard becomes particularly important over time: the notion that, under rational basis review, legislatures need not actually support their judgments with actual, record facts. Rather, the judiciary is free to presume the existence of such facts. Further developed in future cases, this aspect of rational basis review has a profound effect on litigation underneath this standard. Specifically, it relieves the legislative burden of providing evidence for the rationality of the classification.

57 See Heller v. Doe, 509 U.S. 312, 320 (1993) (quoting FCC v. Beach Communications, 508 U.S. 307, 313 (1993)) (“a classification ‘must be upheld against equal protection challenge if there is any reasonably conceivable set of facts that could provide a rational basis for the classification.’”); see also id. at 320 (“A State . . . has no obligation to produce evidence to sustain the rationality of a statutory classification.”). Heller is the case that advocates and courts cite to invoke the weakest form of rational basis review. Interestingly, virtually all the cases cited in Heller for the rational basis review standard were cases involving discrimination in the commercial context. Beach Communications, for example, was a case involving regulations affecting cable television providers.
branch of any obligation to provide reasons for its decisions, permits the judiciary to engage in rank speculation in an effort to justify legislative action, and thereby creates a virtually insurmountable evidentiary barrier for plaintiffs attacking legislative action: proving the absence of any conceivable justification for a law.\textsuperscript{58}

In a footnote appended to this passage, the Court briefly stated (without deciding) that this default standard of rational basis review would not necessarily apply in every instance where the Court was reviewing state legislative action:

\begin{quote}
It is unnecessary to consider now whether legislation that restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation, is to be subjected to more exacting judicial scrutiny under the \end{quote}

\textsuperscript{58} See id. at 320 (quoting \textit{Lehnhausen v. Lake Shore Auto Parts Co.}, 410 U.S. 356, 364 (1973)) (“The burden is on the one attacking the legislative arrangement to negative every conceivable basis which might support it.”). The \textit{Lehnhausen} case involved a tax code distinction between corporations and other entities.
general prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment than other types of legislation. . . . Nor need we enquire whether similar considerations enter into the review of statutes directed at particular religious or racial minorities; whether prejudice against discrete and insular minorities may be a special condition, which tends to seriously curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities, and which may call for correspondingly more searching judicial scrutiny.\textsuperscript{59}

It is these one-hundred-some words that gave birth to modern equal protection doctrine.

From the standpoint of precedential weight, there are several significant aspects to this passage. First, it is clearly signaled as being dicta—the Court is enumerating issues that it need not decide. Second, it was offered in a case that did not even purport to undertake any sort of serious equal protection analysis. Third, the text of the footnote is brief and ambiguous.

\textsuperscript{59} Carolene Products, 304 U.S. at 152 n.4.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

Taken in context to the passage to which it is appended, it could be seen as drawing a fundamental distinction between laws that, on their face, distinguish between classes of things (e.g., “regulatory legislation affecting ordinary commercial transactions”60) and those that distinguish between classes of persons, a category in which religious, racial, and other “discrete and insular” minorities may just be an example. It is certainly not clear that the reference to religious, racial, and other “discrete and insular minorities” was meant to be an exhaustive list of areas of concern.

From its humble beginnings, the “theory” articulated in Carolene Products footnote four was quietly elevated to the level of core constitutional doctrine, the first step, arguably, being in the following passage from Korematsu v. United States,61 where the Court declared (without citation to Carolene Products or any other authority):

60 Id. at 151.

Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

It should be noted, to begin with, that all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect. That is not to say that all such restrictions are unconstitutional. It is to say that courts must subject them to the most rigid scrutiny. Pressing public necessity may sometimes justify the existence of such restrictions; racial antagonism never can.62

This was the first time the Court alluded to the notion of “suspect” classifications and the greater level of scrutiny the Court would apply to laws relying on them.63 The Court’s 1967 decision in Loving solidified race as a suspect classification to which heightened scrutiny should apply, but again, without invoking Carolene Products or performing a suspect classification analysis.64

62 Id. at 216.

63 See Barnes & Chemerinsky, supra note 25, at 1078.

64 See Eskridge, supra note 22, at 5 (“In Loving v. Virginia, the Court formalized the Brown line of cases, holding that race is a
Indeed, the Court did not explicitly invoke Carolene Products as providing the basis for suspect classification analysis until 1971 (and even then it did so in a cursory manner).\textsuperscript{65} Nonetheless, two years later, in 1973, the Court had already deemed the Carolene Products criteria “traditional indicia of suspectness.”\textsuperscript{66} In a sense reflecting its baffling, disproportionate, and sudden impact, reminiscent of undeserved suspect classification that can be deployed by the state only when necessary to serve compelling state interests.

\textsuperscript{65} See Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365, 372 (1971) (announcing without analysis that aliens were a discrete and insular minority per Carolene Products, and therefore entitled to “heightened judicial solicitude”).

\textsuperscript{66} San Antonio Ind. Sch. Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 28 (1973) (referring to the “traditional indicia of suspectness”); see also Strauss, supra note 21, at 145 (describing evolution of suspect classification analysis from being relatively unformed in the early 1970s, but deemed “traditional” by the time of the Court’s 1973 decision in Rodriguez).
celebrity status, the Court came to refer to footnote four as “famous.”

Thus, rather than emerging from a thoughtful consideration of the meaning and purpose of the Equal Protection Clause, we see that the governing structures of equal protection analysis originated as an afterthought from an unimportant case—indeed, a case that did not even purport to engage in an equal protection analysis. It is little wonder, then, that suspect classification analysis does not appear to reflect a coherent set of values tied to the history and purpose of the Equal Protection Clause. And its haphazard development in later years did not serve to correct this problem.

---

68 Bruce A. Ackerman, Beyond Carolene Products, 98 Harv. L. Rev. 713, 713 (1985) ("These famous words, appearing in the otherwise unimportant Carolene Products case . . . .").
C. Suspect Classifications: The Unarticulated Race Paradigm

Race is the paradigmatic suspect classification.\textsuperscript{69} It is the classification to which others are compared. But the Court has never performed a suspect classification analysis per se with respect to race. On the one hand, this makes sense, as the original historical purpose of the Equal Protection Clause was to protect emancipated slaves from invidious discrimination, such that it can be presumed that race classifications are generally impermissible.\textsuperscript{70} But the absence of an affirmative explanation of why it is presumptively invidious to discriminate on the basis of race has left a void of reasoning on the issue, inhibiting the Court’s ability to evaluate other claims to suspect classification status. In failing to affirmatively articulate, as a matter of principle, why race is suspect, the Court has left the core understanding of suspect classifications under-theorized.

\textsuperscript{69} See, \textit{e.g.}, Lopez & Olivas, \textit{supra} note 33, at 291 (referring to African Americans as the “quintessential constitutional out-group).

\textsuperscript{70} Strauss, \textit{supra} note 21, at 142.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

As described above, the Court’s 1944 decision in Korematsu declared race a suspect classification, but did not explain why this was so. The plaintiff in Korematsu was described as “an American citizen of Japanese descent” who had been convicted of violating an order of the army to the effect that “all persons of Japanese ancestry” were to be excluded from a designated military area. Prior to engaging the merits of the plaintiff’s claim, the Court announced that “all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect.” This assertion was not supported by citation to any authority. Ultimately, despite expressing this suspicion of racial classifications, the Court concluded that Japanese ancestry was a sufficient proxy for potential disloyalty under the circumstances of war, and affirmed the conviction.

Between Korematsu and the Court’s groundbreaking decision in Brown came an arguably equally important decision that nevertheless has been largely lost to the annals of history:

72 Id. at 216.
73 Id. at 223-24.
Hernandez v. State of Texas. Hernandez recognized the concept of social group discrimination outside of/in addition to the familiar race discrimination paradigm, and articulated a surprisingly clear alternative vision of equal protection analysis-complete with a coherent evidentiary rule. The plaintiff in the case, who had been a defendant in a criminal trial, claimed that “persons of Mexican descent” were being systematically excluded from jury service and this violated plaintiffs equal protection rights. As in Brown, the Court did not apply a suspect classification analysis or discuss tiers of scrutiny. Rather, the Court stated that excluding persons belonging to a particular class from jury service was, in essence, a per se violation of equal protection.

75 “When the existence of a distinct class is demonstrated, and it is further shown that the laws, as written or applied, single out that class for different treatment not based on some reasonable
In so holding, the Court first rejected the State of Texas’ contention that “there are only two classes—white and Negro—within the contemplation of the Fourteenth Amendment.” The Court acknowledged that “differences in race and color have defined easily identifiable groups which at times have required the aid of the courts in securing equal treatment under the law.” In other words, clearly, there was a history of discrimination based on visible race differences between African Americans and whites, and the fact of that discrimination necessitated special judicial solicitude. But that was not to say classification, the guarantees of the Constitution have been violated.” Hernandez, 347 U.S. at 478. The Court’s reference to a “reasonable classification” could be seen as alluding to rational basis review, but in its analysis the Court actually hewed to a bright line, per se rule of equal protection violation.

Id. at 477.

Id. Although the decision focused on analogies to race discrimination, it did not explicitly treat the case before it as race discrimination because Mexican Americans were considered to be white. See Lopez & Olivas, supra note 33, at 293.
that this was the only type of discrimination plaguing American society, and the only type that required a remedy. Rather, the Court recognized the possibility that types and forms of discrimination might evolve and take new forms: “community prejudices are not static, and from time to time other differences from the community norm may define other groups which need the same protection.”

Given the current disarray of the Court’s equal protection jurisprudence, Hernandez presents a remarkably clear framework for identifying impermissible discrimination, on both a doctrinal and an evidentiary level. The Court simply asked whether the targeted group was a distinct social group, a question that it designated as a factual inquiry, and further indicated precisely how plaintiffs could prove this element: “The plaintiff’s initial burden in substantiating his charge of group discrimination was to prove that persons of Mexican descent constitute a separate class [in the plaintiff’s community], distinct from ‘whites.’ One method by which this may be demonstrated is

---

78 Hernandez, 347 U.S. at 670.
by showing the attitude of the community."

In Hernandez, the evidence revealed that “residents of the community distinguished between ‘white’ and ‘Mexican.’”

In addition, Mexican children were sent to segregated schools, and “[a]t least one restaurant in town prominently displayed a sign announcing ‘No Mexicans Served.’”

Spanish-speaking men were directed to the courthouse restroom reserved for “Colored Men” by a sign that read “Hombres Aquí.” This was sufficient to establish “the existence of a class.”

Having proved the existence of a distinct class, the plaintiff “was then charged with the burden of proving discrimination,” which he did successfully (and straightforwardly) by pointing to the complete absence of Mexicans from juries in the county for some twenty-five years.

---

79 Id. at 671.

80 Id.

81 Id.

82 Id.

83 Id.

84 Id. at 672.
The general assertions by jury commissioners that they had not discriminated in selecting jurors was deemed too vague to overcome the plaintiff’s prima facie case of discrimination.85

_Hernandez_ articulated a radically different—and radically simpler—vision for identifying when a law violates the Equal Protection Clause. “Chief Justice Warren asked two questions: if there existed a ‘distinct class,’ and if the challenged practice amounted to ‘different treatment.’”86 Compared to the factors involved in suspect classification analysis—assessments of groups’ relative political power, or whether the trait defining that group is immutable—these determinations are grounded in concrete evidence, accessible to the equal protection plaintiff, and within the competence of the judiciary to evaluate. Further, _Hernandez_ expressed a clear focus on the consequences of discriminatory laws, rather than inquiring into the relative worthiness of different social groups for judicial protection.87

85 _Id._

86 Lopez & Olivas, _supra_ note 33, at 291.

87 “The _Hernandez_ test rests on opposition to group hierarchy: It focuses on status and subordination, without being distracted by
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

But the insights provided by the Hernandez decision—that impermissible discrimination could take many forms and be directed at many groups—were eclipsed by the Court’s subsequent race discrimination cases, which established race as the paradigmatic suspect classification at the same time that the Court avoided explaining why this was so.88

From the perspective of Hernandez, Brown can be read as applying Chief Justice Warren’s two-part test: of course African-Americans were a distinct social group; the real question was whether “separate but equal” segregation in the context of public education meant these school children were being subject to “different treatment.” The Plessy Court had concluded that mere segregation was not a problematic form of discrimination. The Brown Court repudiated that view, concluding that segregation was unequal treatment of concern to the Equal Protection Clause.

88 In fact, the Court has never fully explained how any classification becomes suspect. See Strauss, supra note 21, at 138 (finding that “[t]he Supreme Court has not provided a coherent explanation for precisely what factors trigger heightened scrutiny.”). Strauss contends that the absence of a coherent, disciplined test enables judicial manipulation of the doctrine. Id. at 140 (“The ambiguity surrounding equal protection analysis produces incoherent results.”).

Thus, the Brown Court held that segregation—particularly state-imposed segregation—was in and of itself a harm sufficient to constitute “different treatment” ala Hernandez and a constitutional violation. But nowhere in Brown did Chief Justice Warren reiterate a core portion of the reasoning in Hernandez: that these concepts and concerns applied to differential treatment of any distinct social group, not just to cases of race discrimination. Without this angle, Brown can easily be read as nothing more than a statement of the presumptive impermissibility of race discrimination.

---

90 See Barnes & Chemerinsky, supra note 25, at 1076 (finding that the Court has rejected the notion that Equal Protection is limited to protecting Blacks. What really matters is whether the racial group existed within a community).

Similarly, in McLaughlin v. Florida,\(^9\) a case involving prohibitions against interracial cohabitation, the Court seemed to contradict Hernandez by suggesting that the suspectness of racial classifications was unique given the history and original purposed of the Fourteenth Amendment.\(^9\) Because of this, race classifications were “‘constitutionally suspect’ and subject to the ‘most rigid scrutiny.’”\(^9\) Thus, the McLaughlin Court made the strong connection between suspect classifications and heightened scrutiny, but pinned suspect classification status to the original purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment.

---

\(^9\) See id. at 192 (justifying departure from rational basis review because “[w]e deal here with a classification based upon the race of the participants, which must be viewed in light of the historical fact that the central purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was to eliminate racial discrimination emanating from official sources is the States.”).

\(^9\) Id.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

The Court similarly emphasized the uniqueness of race discrimination in Loving v. Virginia,94 all but erasing the notion advanced in Hernandez that forms of discrimination were subject to change and that all social-group discrimination was inherently problematic. In defending the challenged anti-miscegenation law, the State had argued that equal protection concerns did not apply to laws that merely contained racial classifications where those classifications did not impose differential treatment in terms of the punishment meted out. As a result, according to the State, the anti-miscegenation laws should be subject only to rational basis review.95 The Court rejected this “equal application” argument and the associated notion that laws with facial classifications should be reviewed with typical deference—that is, in the same manner as when evaluating “a statute discriminating between kinds of advertising which may be displayed on trucks or an exemption in Ohio’s ad valorem tax for merchandise owned by a non-resident in a

95 Id. at 8.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

storage warehouse.” Thus, the Loving Court cemented the connection between suspect classification designation and heightened scrutiny. Like Carolene Products footnote four, this

96 Id.

97 See Eskridge, supra note 22, at 5. Although Loving declared that race classifications must be subject to the “most rigid scrutiny,” the Court’s articulation of that standard does not comport with our contemporary understanding of strict scrutiny. Specifically, the Court stated that, to be upheld, such laws “must be shown to be necessary to the accomplishment of some permissible state objective, independent of the racial discrimination which it was the object of the Fourteenth Amendment to eliminate.” Loving, 388 U.S. at 11. The Court then concluded: “There is patently no legitimate overriding purpose independent of invidious race discrimination which justifies this classification.” Id. Thus, the anti-miscegenation laws in Loving were not struck under strict scrutiny per se, but because they performed an impermissible function—expressing and enforcing unconstitutional animus. See id. (describing anti-miscegenation laws “as measures designed to maintain White Supremacy”); see reasoning could plausibly be read as establishing a bright-line distinction between discrimination in a commercial context versus discrimination among classes of persons. But because of the heavy emphasis on the presumptive impermissibility of race discrimination, Loving is typically read as being limited to a narrower proposition—the presumptive impermissibility of race discrimination.

The closest the Court came to explaining the reasons why race was a suspect classification (beyond the historical purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment) was by declaring the color of one's skin irrelevant to determining legal—especially criminal—burdens.98

---

98 Loving, 388 U.S. at 11 (noting that “two members of this Court have stated that they ‘cannot conceive of a valid legislative
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

It was not until 1971, in examining the issue of discrimination based on alienage, that the Court explicitly invoked Carolene Products and articulated something that could be called a suspect classification analysis. The laws at issue in Graham v. Richardson99 excluded resident aliens from welfare benefits. The state asserted that alienage was not a suspect classification akin to race and national origin, but the Court determined that its prior decisions “established that classifications based on alienage, like those based on nationality or race, are inherently suspect and subject to close judicial scrutiny.”100

The Court stated simply: “Aliens are a prime example of a discrete and insular minority for whom such heightened judicial solicitude is appropriate.”101 Thus, the case tipping off the era of suspect classification analysis invoked Carolene Products purpose . . . which makes the color of a person’s skin the test of whether his conduct is a criminal offense”).

100 Id. at 371-72.

101 Id.
footnote four as established doctrine, despite the novelty of this approach, and sealed the “discrete and insular minority” concept in the pantheon of suspect classification criteria, without analysis or explanation.

The story of the development of the suspect classifications is opaque. The Court’s decision in Hernandez suggested the possibility of a robust equal protection jurisprudence that would monitor the laws for evolving forms of social group discrimination. But this approach was quickly abandoned as subsequent cases emphasized race as a historically distinct social marker, so inherently pernicious that the Court never bothered to discuss why race is a problematic classification. This void of analysis thus left room for the Court to later declare that race classifications would be subject to strict scrutiny regardless of whether it was whites or racial minorities who were affected.

It was not until the Court considered arguments to expand suspect classification status to include other social groups that the Court began to articulate a more reasoned basis for granting—or denying—this designation.
D. Quasi-Suspect Classifications: Stereotype and Self-Determination

Paradoxically, suspect classification analysis was not clearly articulated around the identification of suspect classifications. Rather, it was in recognizing lesser classifications ("quasi-suspect" classifications) and non-suspect classifications that the Court began to offer reasons for granting the designation in some cases while denying it in others.

Recognizing that not every classification was always inherently suspect, but that rational basis review was insufficient to protect against some types of discrimination that were still of concern, the Court developed yet another category of classification and another level of scrutiny: quasi-suspect classifications, to which are subject to the chimeric intermediate scrutiny standard. Two classifications were ultimately placed in this category: gender and illegitimacy.

The Court's treatment of gender discrimination perhaps best embodies the Court's ambivalence about suspect classification analysis. In 1971, the Court recognized that gender discrimination was of concern to the Equal Protection Clause in
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

Reed v. Reed.\textsuperscript{102} The law at issue was an Idaho statute providing that, in the context of choosing between otherwise equally qualified persons for the role of administrator of an estate, “males must be preferred to females.”\textsuperscript{103} The Court determined that, because the statute “provides that different treatment be accorded to the applicants on the basis of their sex . . . it thus establishes a classification subject to scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause.”\textsuperscript{104} The Court did not perform any sort of suspect classification analysis in this early case, but simply determined that the sex classification lacked a rational relationship to the goal of the law.\textsuperscript{105} Under this standard, the \textsuperscript{102} Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71 (1971).

\textsuperscript{103} Id. at 73 (quoting Section 15-314).

\textsuperscript{104} Id. at 75.

\textsuperscript{105} Id. at 75-76 (“The Equal Protection Clause . . . den[ies] to States the power to legislate that different treatment be accorded to persons placed by a statute into different classes on the basis of criteria wholly unrelated to the objective of that statute.”); see also id. at 76 (“A classification ‘must be reasonable, not arbitrary, and must rest upon some ground of difference
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

Court determined that creating a sex preference in order to reduce workload on the probate courts was “the very kind of arbitrary legislative choice forbidden by the Equal Protection Clause.”\(^{106}\)

Thus, Reed at most reflected a common sense agreement that gender classifications were an object of concern for the Equal Protection Clause, and that gender not a valid proxy for competence to administer an estate. The Court did little to support these conclusions beyond stating them.

It was not until the Court’s next major gender case, Frontiero v. Richardson,\(^ {107}\) that the Court explicitly considered whether gender was a suspect classification. At issue in Frontiero \[\text{having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation, so that all persons similarly circumstanced shall be treated alike.} \] (quoting Royster Guano Co. v. Virginia, 253 U.S. 412. 415 (1920)). As suggested by its evocative title, Royster Guano Co. was a case dealing with discrimination in a commercial (tax) context against a fertilizer producer.

\(^{106}\) Reed, 404 U.S. at 77.

was a statute used to determine whether a member of the military was entitled to certain spousal benefits. Under the statute, male service members were entitled to such benefits simply by virtue of having a wife; female service members had to affirmatively prove that their husband was dependent to access the same benefits.

The plaintiff—apparently not content with the vague arbitrariness analysis in Reed—argued that “classifications based on sex, like classifications based upon race, alienage, and national origin, are inherently suspect and must therefore be subject to close judicial scrutiny.”\(^{108}\) A plurality of the Court agreed, deciding that sex was a trait sufficiently analogous to race\(^ {109}\) such that sex-based classifications were inherently suspect and should “be subjected to strict judicial scrutiny” as a result.\(^ {110}\)

\(^{108}\) Id. at 682.

\(^{109}\) See id. at 685 (The Court went on to state that “the position of women in our society was, in many respects, comparable to that of blacks under the pre-Civil War slave codes.”).

\(^{110}\) Id. at 688.
In reaching this conclusion, the Court first pointed to Reed, which it characterized as departing from traditional rational basis review. In Reed, the government had justified the law at issue as reflecting fair assumption that men were “as a rule more conversant with business affairs than . . . women.”\(^\text{111}\) Because the Reed Court (1) acknowledged that there was some truth to this generalization (certainly enough to provide a rational basis), but (2) nonetheless determined that it represented forbidden, arbitrary discrimination, the Reed Court had “depart[ed]” from traditional rational basis review.\(^\text{112}\) In other words, because the Reed Court “implicitly rejected appellee’s apparently rational explanation of the statutory scheme,”\(^\text{113}\) it must have been applying some form of heightened scrutiny.

In addition to generally comparing gender to race, the Court examined what are now the recognized suspect classification criteria. First, it noted that “[t]here can be no doubt \(^{111}\) Id. at 683 (quoting Brief for Appellee).

\(^{112}\) Id. at 684.

\(^{113}\) Id. at 683.
that our Nation has had a long and unfortunate history of sex discrimination.” As a result of pervasive, paternalistic views of women and their abilities, “our statute books gradually became laden with gross, stereotyped distinctions between the sexes.”

The Court conceded “that the position of women in America has improved markedly in recent decades,” but countered that “because of the high visibility of the sex characteristic, women still face pervasive, although at times more subtle, discrimination.”

Second, the Court addressed the immutability factor. The Court found that “since sex, like race and national origin, is an immutable characteristic determined solely by accident of birth, the imposition of special disabilities upon the members of

114 Id. at 684.

115 Id. at 685.

116 Id. at 685-86. Note that the fairness or unfairness of distributing legal burdens based on a trait over which one does not have control represents an entirely independent and distinct philosophy of invidious discrimination from an inquiry into history of discrimination or political powerlessness.
particular sex because of their sex would seem to violate ‘the basic concept of our system that legal burdens should bear some relationship to individual responsibility . . . .’”\(^\text{117}\)

The Court went on to reason that sex is different than other immutable traits (e.g., intelligence or physical disability) because “the sex characteristic frequently bears no relationship to ability to perform or contribute to society.”\(^\text{118}\) Thus, such stereotypes are dangerous because they interfere with the ideal of self-determination: “statutory distinctions between the sexes often have the effect of invidiously relegating the entire class of females to inferior legal status without regard to the actual capabilities of its individual members.”\(^\text{119}\)

---

\(^\text{117}\) Id. at 686 (quoting Weber).

\(^\text{118}\) Id. The focus on ability is especially poignant in thinking about people with disabilities and the Cleburne analysis. If we give a blanket authorization (that is, apply rational basis review) to discrimination based on ability, we permit laws to disadvantage the disabled in areas not related to their disability, and mark them as an underclass.

\(^\text{119}\) Id. at 686-87.
Finally, in assessing the political power of women, the Court noted that “Congress has itself manifested an increasing sensitivity to sex-based classifications.”\(^{120}\) Interestingly, the Court took this legislative solicitude as evidence that women lacked political power (as compared to the Court’s analysis in \textit{Cleburne}, where the Court interpreted legislative concern as a sign of the presence of a certain type of political power). The Court deferred to Congress’ conclusion “that classifications based upon sex are inherently invidious, and this conclusion of a coequal branch of Government is not without significance to the question presently under consideration.”\(^{121}\)

Concluding that sex was a suspect classification, such that strict scrutiny should apply, the plurality found the government’s reliance on distinction between male and female service members vis-à-vis spousal benefits could not be justified by an interest as minimal as “administrative convenience.”\(^{122}\)

\(^{120}\) \textit{Id.} at 687.

\(^{121}\) \textit{Id.} at 687-88.

\(^{122}\) \textit{Id.} at 688.
It is important to note that the Court conceded that the gender classification in Frontiero would survive rational basis review. The government’s interest in expediently distributing benefits (and conserving the fisc, where possible) is patently legitimate. Further, the presumption implicit in the classification—that wives are more likely dependent on their husbands than the other way around—while a generalization, was sufficiently precise to satisfy the “rationally related” requirement. Under rational basis review, it is permissible to rely on inaccurate stereotypes. We can see very clearly here how suspect classification analysis and the tiers of scrutiny determine outcomes in equal protection cases. The fate of the plaintiff’s claim in Frontiero truly depended on whether the Court could be convinced to apply heightened scrutiny.

The concern expressed in Frontiero is not that gender is an entirely inaccurate proxy for the qualities the government is seeking to regulate, but that it is nonetheless invalid because it tends to perpetuate harmful stereotypes. This is an interesting take on the difference between rational basis review and heightened scrutiny. It suggests that invidious discrimination may, in fact, be rational, but nonetheless problematic because it perpetuates stereotypes or simply expresses a sentiment we consider to be unfair. If invidious discrimination can have a rational basis, this in turn suggests that rational basis review on its own cannot effectively screen for invidious discrimination, because what makes such discrimination invidious is not that the underlying presumptions are radically inaccurate, but because of the expressive function of such classifications.

Justice Powell, joined by Justice Blackmun, concurred in the judgment but disagreed with the plurality’s decision to deem sex a suspect classification. The concurrence evidences the nascent concern with the multiplication of suspect classes and the effect of this development on the dynamics of judicial review. Justice Powell further criticized the Court for 123 Id. at 691-92 (Powell, J., concurring) (“It is unnecessary for the Court in this case to characterize sex as a suspect classification, with all of its far-reaching implications.”). See also Yoshino, supra note 29, at 757 (noting that the Supreme Court has not accorded heightened scrutiny to any new group based on suspect classification since 1977 and arguing that, due to prematurely interfering in the democratic debate over the Equal Rights Amendment. He contended that premature designation of suspect classifications disrupts the balance between the judicial branch and the democratic process:

---

There are times when this Court, under our system, cannot avoid a constitutional decision on issues which normally should be resolved by the elected representatives of the people. But democratic institutions are weakened, and confidence in the restraint of the Court is impaired, when we appear unnecessarily to decide sensitive issues of broad social and political importance at the very time they are under consideration within the prescribed constitutional processes.

“pluralism anxiety, “[a]t least with respect to federal equal protection jurisprudence, this canon has closed”).

124 Frontiero, 411 U.S. at 692 (Powell, J., concurring).

125 Id.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

Thus, Justice Powell drew a connection between suspect classification analysis, the levels of judicial scrutiny, and a commitment to separation of powers that would echo through the Court’s subsequent jurisprudence.

In its next major gender decision, the Court retreated from equating sex discrimination to race discrimination. In Craig v. Boren, the issue was whether young men’s equal protection rights were being violated when the State of Oklahoma denied them the right to purchase “nonintoxicating” 3.2% beer while under the age of 21, when the seductive elixir was made to available to women upon reaching the age of 18.

The Court noted that Reed had established that sex-based classifications receive equal protection scrutiny, and further 127 Interestingly, the male plaintiff, Craig, dropped out because he attained the age of 21, rendering his claim moot. Id. at 192.

The remaining plaintiff, Whitener, was female, but challenged the law as a vendor of 3.2% beer subject to penalties under the statute—not on the basis of being discriminated against because of her gender.
asserted (without immediate citation, although the Court eventually referred to Frontiero, among other cases) that “previous cases establish that classifications by gender must serve important governmental objectives and must be substantially related to achievement of those objectives.”\(^{128}\) The Court also credited Reed with establishing the notion that laws may not rely on gender as a proxy when other, “more germane bases of classification” were available.\(^{129}\) The Court then asked, essentially, whether gender was an adequate proxy in this particular context.\(^{130}\) Specifically, the Court agreed that the purported goal of enhancing traffic safety was an important state interest, but rejected the state’s statistical argument that the gender distinction “closely serves to achieve that objective.”\(^{131}\)

\(^{128}\) Id. at 197.

\(^{129}\) Id. at 198.

\(^{130}\) Id. at 199 (posing the controlling question as “whether . . . the difference between males and females with respect to the purchase of 3.2\% beer warrants the differential age drawn by the Oklahoma statute”).

\(^{131}\) Id. at 199-200.
The Court characterized the evidentiary record as “unpersuasive.” It was less a matter of the accuracy of the statistical surveys (the Court conceded that the statistical gender disparities were “not trivial in a statistical sense”\textsuperscript{132}), than a matter of the inquiry itself being beside the point:

There is no reason to belabor this line of analysis. It is unrealistic to expect members of the judiciary or state officials to be well versed in the rigors of experimental or statistical technique. But this merely illustrates that proving broad social propositions by statistics is a dubious business, and one that inevitably is in tension with the normative philosophy that underlies the Equal Protection Clause.\textsuperscript{133}

Thus, the Court expressed what became a recurring theme in the gender cases. It does not matter if a generalization is true or useful. Generalizations (at least about the genders) are always problematic in and of themselves. But the Court did not

\textsuperscript{132} \textit{Id.} at 201.

\textsuperscript{133} \textit{Id.} at 204.
articulate precisely why this is the case. After alluding to unarticulated “normative” concerns, it merely offered: “[T]he relationship between gender and traffic safety becomes far too tenuous to satisfy Reed’s requirement that the gender-based differences can be substantially related to achievement of the statutory objective.” \[134\]

This piece of reasoning is a perfect demonstration of the manner in which scrutiny of the tailoring of a particular law (that is, whether the relationship between the classification and the purpose of the law is “too tenuous”) supplants a discussion of the normative principles at play.

The Court made some effort to elaborate on these underlying “normative” principles in footnote twenty-two of the decision, where it explained by analogy that, even if there were real statistical differences between ethnic or religious groups vis-à-vis alcohol abuse, the Equal Protection Clause would not permit such distinctions to be drawn in the laws. \[135\] But even here the Court never precisely explained \textit{why} such regulations would be offensive. It simply noted “society’s perception of the unfairness and questionable constitutionality of singling out groups to bear the brunt of alcohol regulation.”

\[134\] \textit{Id.}

\[135\] \textit{Id.} at 208 n.22.

It was in his concurrence to this case that Justice Stevens famously expressed his tiers-of-scrutiny fatigue, stating, “There is only one Equal Protection Clause.” The provision “does not direct the courts to apply one standard of review in some cases and a different standard of review in other cases.” Justice Stevens then identified his reasons for finding the gender classifications at issue unconstitutional: (1) the fact that gender is “an accident of birth,” such that imposing differential burdens on the basis of gender “would seem to violate the basic concept of our system that legal burdens should bear some relationship to individual responsibility”; (2) the law was

---

136 Id.
137 Id. at 211 (Stevens, J., concurring).
138 Id. at 212.
139 Id.
140 Id. at 212 n.2 (quoting Weber v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 406 U.S. 164, 175 (1972)) (internal quotation marks omitted).
based on an abandoned “tradition of discriminating against males in this age bracket”\textsuperscript{141}; and (3) the stereotype was “perverse” because the actual physical differences between men and women suggested it was women who should have restricted access to alcohol (because “males are generally heavier than females”).\textsuperscript{142}

Justice Stevens emphasized that the law was “not totally irrational” and would have survived the Court’s most deferential level of scrutiny.\textsuperscript{143} (Indeed, it is virtually impossible to imagine what laws—including those based on race—would not survive if subject only to rational basis review, because rational basis review (1) permits reliance on inaccurate stereotype and (2) contains no mechanism for identifying which stereotypes we consider unfair.\textsuperscript{144}) But under a standard even slightly more

\textsuperscript{141} \textit{Id.} at 212.

\textsuperscript{142} \textit{Id.} at 212-13 & n.4.

\textsuperscript{143} \textit{Id.} at 213.

\textsuperscript{144} Following Stevens’ rationale, Suzanne Goldberg claimed that “[A] unitary [equal protection standard] potentially would narrow the gap between the virtually assured fatal blow dealt to demanding—say, one of plausibility—the law would necessarily fail due to the lack of correlation between the trait of gender and the purported goals of the statute. Justice Stevens considered such an overbroad classification—burdening 100% of young males when only 2% were prone to violating drinking and driving laws—to amount to "an insult to all of the young men of the State." Much like the majority opinion, Justice Stevens in his concurrence conflated concerns over accuracy with concerns over reliance on offensive stereotypes.

Justice Stewart also wrote separately to assert that "[t]he disparity created by these Oklahoma statutes amounts to total irrationality," demonstrating a rather striking lack of consensus as to the meaning of the term, while Justice Burger dissented, arguing that there was no constitutional basis for treating gender as a disfavored classification, and noting that, because classifications under strict scrutiny and the rubber stamp regularly received by classifications subject to rational basis review." Goldberg, supra note 24, at 491.

Craig, 429 U.S. at 214 (Stevens, J., concurring).

Id. at 215 (Stewart, J., concurring).
eight of nine justices had concluded the law was not irrational (albeit unwise), the law should have been upheld under the default standard of rational basis review.\textsuperscript{147}

Justice Rehnquist dissented as well, focusing on two points: first, that it was inconsistent to apply heightened scrutiny to a law discriminating against men—a class that had not suffered a history of discrimination and marginalization\textsuperscript{148}; and second, that the majority had created a new level of scrutiny out of whole cloth.\textsuperscript{149} Unsurprisingly, relying heavily on the

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{147} Nd. at 217 (Burger, C.J., dissenting).
\textsuperscript{148} Id. at 219 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).
\textsuperscript{149} Id. at 220 (“The Equal Protection Clause contains no such language, and none of our previous cases adopt that standard.”).
\end{flushright}

Justice Rehnquist further criticized the multiplication of standards as mere rhetoric devoid of inherent meaning. “How is this Court to divine what objectives are important? How is it to determine whether a law is “substantially related” to the attainment of such objective . . . ?” \textit{Id.} at 221. “Both of the phrases used are so diaphanous and elastic as to invite deferential nature of traditional rational basis review and the statistical evidence provided by the State, Justice Rehnquist concluded that the laws would have survived rational basis review.

The various opinions in Craig show the justices struggling mightily over the proper application of equal protection principles, but this normative debate is deflected almost entirely onto an argument about the proper standard of review, rather than a discussion about the theory of equality underlying the provision.

The Court’s confusion about the significance of gender discrimination and its meaning came to a head in Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan. In that case, Justice O’Connor wrote for a slim majority to strike a nursing college’s policy of excluding male students. Because the policy “expressly discriminate[d] among applicants on the basis of gender,” it was subject to equal protection scrutiny and, in particular, the subjective judicial preferences or prejudices . . . masquerading as judgments . . . .” Id. at 220.

heightened level of scrutiny applicable to sex discrimination.\textsuperscript{151} The Court further explained, “[t]hat the statutory policy discriminates against males rather than against females does not exempt it from scrutiny or reduce the standard of review.”\textsuperscript{152} The Court articulated the applicable standard as placing the burden on the state to provide an “‘exceedingly persuasive justification’ for the classification,”\textsuperscript{153} which could be met “only by showing at least that the classification serves ‘important governmental objectives and that the discriminatory means employed’ are ‘substantially related to the achievement of those objectives.’”\textsuperscript{154} In applying this test, courts are obligated to exclude “fixed notions concerning the roles and abilities of males and females.”\textsuperscript{155} Here, Justice O’Connor made what is perhaps the most compelling (and explicit) justification for applying heightened

\textsuperscript{151} \textit{Id.} at 722.

\textsuperscript{152} \textit{Id.} at 723.

\textsuperscript{153} \textit{Id.} at 724 (citation omitted).

\textsuperscript{154} \textit{Id.} (citations omitted).

\textsuperscript{155} \textit{Id.} at 724-25.
The purpose of requiring that close relationship [between the governmental objective and the discriminatory means] is to assure that the validity of a classification is determined through reasoned analysis rather than through the mechanical application of the traditional, often inaccurate, assumptions about the proper roles of men and women.

Thus, according to Justice O'Connor, heightened scrutiny serves to force courts to reason through the appropriateness of relying on certain classifications rather than presuming their validity because they rest on familiar and comfortable stereotypes.

The Court found that the policy failed both prongs of the intermediate scrutiny standard. The State offered the important state interest of remedying discrimination against women, but O'Connor noted that women made up the vast majority of nurses both in Mississippi and nationwide, giving lie to the contention

\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 725.}
that any remedy was needed.157 Further, because of the predominance of women in nursing, maintaining the school for women only “tend[ed] to perpetuate the stereotyped view of nursing as an exclusively woman’s job.”158 Finally, the policy was not appropriately tailored to achieve its objectives, because men were permitted to audit classes at the school and fully participate, such that a single-gender educational environment was not being preserved in any case.159

The four dissenters in the case—Justices Burger, Blackmun, Powell and Rehnquist—reflected a fundamentally different perspective on the role of gender segregation in educational environments. Specifically, Justice Burger worried that the holding might be extended to other types of schools as well.160 Justice Blackmun lamented the “rigid” approach to sex discrimination, suggesting that it would erode legitimate values

157 Id. at 728.

158 Id. at 730.

159 Id.

160 Id. at 733 (Burger, C.J., dissenting).
preferences without necessarily increasing equality.\textsuperscript{161} Justice Blackmun invoked the specter of conformity,\textsuperscript{162} and Justice Powell echoed this theme.\textsuperscript{163} He contended—in rhetoric eerily and surely unintentionally reminiscent of \textit{Plessy}—that “[t]he sexual segregation of students has been a reflection of, rather than an imposition upon, the preference of those subject to the \textsuperscript{161} \textit{Id.} at 734 (Blackmun, J., dissenting).

\textsuperscript{162} \textit{Id.} (“I hope we do not lose all values that some think are worthwhile (and are not based on differences of race or religion) and relegate ourselves to needless conformity.”). It is certainly fair to say that some may be attached to the values or tradition associated with single-sex educational institutions, but Justice Blackmun’s sentiment is remarkably unreflective. It does not offer any limiting principle—a mechanism for distinguishing between those traditions that are benign versus those that are oppressive.

\textsuperscript{163} \textit{Id.} at 735 (Powell, J., dissenting) (“The Court’s opinion bows deeply to conformity.”).
Justice Powell further found it illogical that a heightened level of judicial scrutiny, “designed to free women from ‘archaic and overbroad generalizations,’” would be applied to a claim of discrimination advanced by a man—in particular a man who had the opportunity to attend a nursing school elsewhere in the state.165

On the whole, the various opinions in the case express a deep ambivalence about whether gender discrimination is equally problematic in different contexts. In another parallel to

164 Id. at 737. See also id. at 740 (noting that the policy “seeks to accommodate the legitimate personal preferences of those desiring the advantages of an all-women’s college”). The Court in Plessy minimized the state’s role in imposing legally sanctioned segregation by stating that it reflected private preferences that the races remain separate. Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 550-51 (1896).

165 Miss. Univ. for Women, 458 U.S. at 740-41 (Powell, J., dissenting) (“By applying heightened equal protection analysis to this case, the Court frustrates the liberating spirit of the Equal Protection Clause.”).
Plessy, some members of the Court appeared to perceive distinctions between discrimination in the sphere of core legal and civil rights, as opposed to the social sphere.

The Court veered back in the other direction in J.E.B. v. Alabama.\(^{166}\) The issue there was whether preemptive challenges based on gender violated the Equal Protection Clause. The emphasis in the Court’s analysis was that gender was not a valid proxy for ability.\(^{167}\) The Court reasoned that heightened scrutiny applies to gender classifications primarily because of the danger of stereotype:

> [T]his Court consistently has subjected gender-based classifications to heightened scrutiny in recognition of the real danger that government policies that professedly are based on reasonable considerations in fact may be reflective of “archaic and overbroad” generalizations about gender, or based on “outdated misconceptions concerning the role of females in the home rather than in the ‘marketplace and world of ideas.’”\textsuperscript{168}

\(^{167}\) Id. at 129 (“We hold that gender, like race, is an unconstitutional proxy for juror competence and impartiality.”).

The Court rejected the government’s attempt to distinguish between race discrimination and sex discrimination.\textsuperscript{169} The Court stated that “[w]hile prejudicial attitudes toward women in this country have not been identical to those held toward racial minorities, the similarities between the experiences of racial minorities and women, in some contexts, ‘overpower those differences.’”\textsuperscript{170}

The Court then went on to state that the question under heightened scrutiny was “whether discrimination on the basis of gender in jury selection substantially furthers the State’s \textsuperscript{168} Id. at 135 (citations omitted).

\textsuperscript{169} Id. at 136. The government had argued that “‘gender discrimination in this country . . . has never reached the level of discrimination’ against African-Americans, and therefore gender discrimination, unlike racial discrimination, is tolerable in the courtroom.” Id.

\textsuperscript{170} Id. at 135.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

legitimate interest in achieving a fair and impartial trial.” The Court further demanded that the state offer an “exceptionally persuasive justification” for the discrimination. The state offered that an all-male jury might be more sympathetic to the male defendant in the case at hand. To this the Court responded: “We shall not accept as a defense to gender-based preemptory challenges ‘the very stereotype the law condemns.'”

Echoing sentiments first articulated in Brown, the Court expressed concern that, when the government relied on and enforced stereotypes, this resulted in a larger symbolic harm to the affected individuals, to society, and to the structures of government itself.

Discrimination in jury selection, whether based on race or gender, causes harm to the litigants, the community, and the individual jurors who are wrongfully excluded from participation in the judicial process. . . . The community is harmed by

---

171 Id. at 136-37.

172 Id. at 137.

173 Id.
the State’s participation in the perpetuation of invidious group stereotypes and the inevitable loss of confidence in our judicial system that state-sanctioned discrimination in the courtroom engenders.\textsuperscript{174}

The dissenters, Justices Scalia and Rehnquist, expressed a fundamental disagreement that reliance on stereotype—no matter how accurate—was always impermissible.\textsuperscript{175}

\textsuperscript{174} \textit{Id.} at 140 ("When state actors exercise preemptory challenges in reliance on gender stereotypes, they ratify and reinforce prejudicial views of the relative abilities of men and women."); \textit{see also id.} ("Striking individual jurors on the assumption they hold particular views simply because of their gender is ‘practically a brand upon them, affixed by the law, as assertion of their inferiority.’")

\textsuperscript{175} \textit{See id.} at 156 (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting) ("The two sexes differ, both biologically and, to a diminishing extent, in experience. It is not merely ‘stereotyping’ to say that these differences may produce a different outlook which is brought to the jury room."); \textit{id.} at 158 (Scalia, J., dissenting) ("Even if sex
In United States v. Virginia, the Court attempted to tackle head on the tension between the harm of stereotype and the “reality” of differences between the sexes. The female plaintiffs challenged their exclusion from the all-male Virginia Military Academy. The Court began by noting that J.E.B. and Mississippi University for Women stood for the proposition that gender discrimination must be supported by an “exceedingly persuasive justification.” This heightened scrutiny was merited, the Court explained, by the Nation’s “long and unfortunate history of sex discrimination.” Applying rational basis review to gender discrimination did not take gender discrimination seriously enough, and permitted unfettered reliance on stereotype (due to the minimal tailoring was a remarkably good predictor in certain cases, the Court would find its use in preemptories unconstitutional.”).

177 Id. at 531.

178 Id. (quoting Frontiero).
requirements of rational basis review). From this perspective, reliance on stereotype or generalizations (permissible under rational basis review) interferes with individual self-determination. According to the Court, women must be afforded “equal opportunity to aspire, achieve, participate and contribute to society based on their individual talents and capacities.”

But the Court noted that gender classifications need not be “equat[ed] . . . for all purposes, to classifications based on race or national origin” for there to be meaningful review of gender discrimination. Specifically, the Court reiterated the “exceedingly persuasive justification” standard, that the burden of meeting that standard was on the state, and that this justification required the state to show that the classification was

---

179 Id. at 531-32 (noting that gender discrimination was previously acceptable if it had “any ‘basis in reason,’” but that since Reed, relying on generalization about women was no longer permissible).

180 Id. at 532.

181 Id.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

substantially related to an important governmental objective.\textsuperscript{182} In contrast to justifications offered under rational basis review, “[t]he justifications must be genuine, not hypothesized or invented \textit{post hoc} in response to litigation.”\textsuperscript{183} Finally, the justification “must not rely on overbroad generalizations about the different talents, capacities, or preferences of males and females.”\textsuperscript{184} These standards, then, stood alone as the means to protect from gender-based discrimination, and did not rely on comparisons to race-based analyses.

Additionally, the Court marked a key distinction between race discrimination and gender discrimination. While race discrimination was always presumptively invalid, gender was not “a proscribed classification.”\textsuperscript{185} This is because there were recognized “inherent differences”\textsuperscript{186} between the genders. The Court noted that “[p]hysical differences between men and

\begin{flushleft}
\\textsuperscript{182} \textit{Id.} at 532-33.
\end{flushleft}

\begin{flushleft}
\\textsuperscript{183} \textit{Id.} at 533.
\end{flushleft}

\begin{flushleft}
\\textsuperscript{184} \textit{Id.}
\end{flushleft}

\begin{flushleft}
\\textsuperscript{185} \textit{Id.}
\end{flushleft}

\begin{flushleft}
\\textsuperscript{186} \textit{Id.}
\end{flushleft}
women . . . are enduring.” On this basis, Justice Ginsburg, writing for the Court, attempted to import normative principles, drawing a distinction between gender classifications that served to denigrate women versus those that sought to further women’s equality.\textsuperscript{188}

In a concurring opinion, Chief Justice Rehnquist criticized the majority for muddying the intermediate scrutiny standard by adding the “exceedingly persuasive justification” language.\textsuperscript{189} The Chief Justice also would not have evaluated the state’s actions prior to recent decisions regarding gender-based classifications because the state had no reason to believe that it was violating the Constitution until recently. “Long after the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, and well into this century, legal distinctions between men and women were thought to raise no question under the Equal Protection Clause.”\textsuperscript{190}

\textsuperscript{187} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{188} \textit{Id.} at 533-34.

\textsuperscript{189} \textit{Id.} at 558 (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting).

\textsuperscript{190} \textit{Id.} at 560.
distinction drawn between excluding women from jury service and excluding them from an all-male educational institution, reiterating the notion expressed in Plessy that concerns about discrimination might be apply only to some types of government action and not others.

In a more pointed critique, Justice Scalia accused the majority of “drastically revis[ing] our established standards for reviewing sex-based classifications.” Justice Scalia agreed that social institutions—historical and contemporary—are permeated with prejudice. But rather than being a call to judicial intervention, such prejudices could be dealt with by our democratic political system: “The virtue of a democratic system with a First Amendment is that it readily enables the people, over time, to be persuaded that what they took for granted is not so, and to change their laws accordingly.” Interestingly, this stance rejects the one portion of Carolene Products footnote four that is relatively clear: the observation that sometimes certain social groups are compromised vis-à-vis their participation in 191 Id. at 566 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

---

192 Id. at 567.
the political process, and the judiciary must take care to notice marginalizing laws of this nature. Justice Scalia later cited footnote four for the proposition that women were not a suspect class because they were neither a discrete and insular minority nor politically powerless.\textsuperscript{193}

Justice Scalia went on to mock the “scientific” tiers of scrutiny framework as an artifice that served to disguise judicial activism.\textsuperscript{194} Scalia’s chief complaint, however, was that the judiciary should work “to \textit{preserve} our society’s values . . . not to \textit{revise} them.”\textsuperscript{195}

The persistent them in the gender cases is ambivalence and confusion over whether reliance on stereotype is ever

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
\item[\textsuperscript{193}] \textit{Id}. at 574-75 ("[T]he suggestion that they are incapable of exerting . . . political power smacks of the same paternalism that the Court so roundly condemns.").
\item[\textsuperscript{194}] \textit{Id}. at 567 ("These tests are no more scientific than their names suggest, and a further element of randomness is added by the fact that it is largely up to us which test will be applied in each case.").
\item[\textsuperscript{195}] \textit{Id}. at 568.
\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize}
permissible, and, if so, whether the Court should be guided by the accuracy of the stereotype (i.e., whether it is based on “real differences”) or the symbolic harm associated with it.

In contrast to the ambivalence expressed around the quasi-suspect classification of gender, the Court’s vision regarding the other quasi-suspect classification—illegitimacy—was quite clear. In Levy v. Louisiana, the Court considered a wrongful death statute that precluded recovery of benefits by illegitimate children. The Court described the Equal Protection Clause as prohibiting invidious discrimination, which would be tested by asking whether “the line drawn” by the challenged law was a rational one.

But the Court drew a distinction between different types of legislation, noting that “[i]n applying the Equal Protection Clause to social and economic legislation, we give great latitude to the legislature in making classifications,” but that this deferential posture had not prevented the Court from striking down “invidious classifications,” especially those touching on “basic civil rights.” The Court concluded that the child’s status as illegitimate did not change the harm of losing a parent: “We conclude that it is invidious to discriminate against [the mother’s illegitimate children] when no action, conduct or demeanor of theirs is possibly relevant to the harm that was done to the mother.” In other words, legal burdens should follow responsibilities, and children can never be held responsible for the circumstances of their birth.

---

197 Id. at 71.

198 Id.

The Court echoed this moral clarity several years later in Weber v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Company. At issue in Weber was the constitutionality of a state law that prevented unacknowledged illegitimate children from recovering benefits under the workman’s compensation system. The Court first confirmed that applicable precedent framed the inquiry as whether “the fact of a child’s birth out of wedlock” bore any 199 Id.

200 Id. at 72.

“reasonable relation” to the purpose of the statute at issue.\textsuperscript{202} This was arguably still rational basis review in form, but the Court posed a more pointed question in practice. The Court asked whether the difference between legitimate and illegitimate children mattered with respect to \textit{the child’s interest in the benefit provided by the law}—which was to be shielded, at least to some extent, from the consequences of parental injury or loss.

Purportedly applying rational basis review to the challenged law, the Court noted the state’s interest “in protecting ‘legitimate family relationships.’”\textsuperscript{203} The Court acknowledged that “the regulation and protection of the family unit have indeed been a venerable state concern.”\textsuperscript{204} The Court did not “question the importance of that interest,” but did question “how the challenged statute will promote it.”\textsuperscript{205} Protecting the family unit is one matter; expressing a bare preference for one type of family is another.

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{202} \textit{Id}. at 168.
\item \textsuperscript{203} \textit{Id}. at 173.
\item \textsuperscript{204} \textit{Id}.
\item \textsuperscript{205} \textit{Id}.
\end{itemize}
The Court ultimately concluded that “[t]he state interest in family relationships is not served by the statute.”\textsuperscript{206} “The inferior classification of unacknowledged illegitimates bears, in this instance, no relationship to those recognized purposes of recovery which workmen’s compensation statutes commendably serve.”\textsuperscript{207} In other words, despite the valid governmental interest in promoting marriage and childbirth in marriage, the Court concluded that punishing or excluding one group of children from important benefits does not advance the interests of the other.

In the penultimate passage of the decision, the Court recognized that punishing “the inferior classification” of children was not only ineffective, but profoundly unfair: “The status of illegitimacy has expressed through the ages society’s condemnation of irresponsible liaisons. But visiting this condemnation of the head of an infant is illogical and unjust.”\textsuperscript{208}

\textsuperscript{206} \textit{Id.} at 175.

\textsuperscript{207} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{208} \textit{Id.}
Thus, the Court specifically disavowed the legislative technique of denying benefits to children in an effort to control the conduct of their parents:

[I]mposing disabilities on the illegitimate child is contrary to the basic concept of our system that legal burdens should bear some relationship to individual responsibility and wrongdoing. Obviously, no child is responsible for his birth, and penalizing the illegitimate child is an ineffectual—as well as unjust—way of deterring the parent.\textsuperscript{209}

In 1977, the Court implicitly recognized that it treated classifications based on illegitimacy as quasi-suspect, and that the applicable standard was, as with gender classifications, intermediate scrutiny.\textsuperscript{210}

\textsuperscript{209} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{210} \textit{See Trimble v. Gordon,} 430 U.S. 762, (1977) (holding that classifications based on legitimacy were not inherently suspect but that “[i]n a case like this, the Equal Protection Clause requires more than the mere incantation of a proper state purpose); \textit{see also} Clark v. Jeter, 485 U.S. 456, 461 (1988)
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

The quasi-suspect classification cases illuminate three different concerns animating suspect classification analysis: the validity/accuracy of certain proxies; the harm of stereotype, regardless of accuracy; and the larger principle of correlating burdens to individual responsibility. The Court never clearly identified, however, which if any of these was a guiding “normative principle” of its jurisprudence.

E. Non-suspect Classifications: Differences That Matter

The cases where the Court denies suspect classification status provide a study in contrasts. Some of these cases are extremely superficial in their analysis, which is troubling, because once suspect classification status is denied, the issue is unlikely to be revisited. This means that the group at issue is (“Between these extremes of rational basis review and strict scrutiny lies a level of intermediate scrutiny, which generally has been applied to classifications based on sex or illegitimacy.”); Yoshino, supra note 29, at 757 ([T]he last classification accorded heightened scrutiny by the Supreme Court was that based on nonmarital parentage in 1977.”) (citing Trimble).

Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

virtually permanently excluded from receiving meaningful review of their claims, given the general weakness of the rational basis standard.

On the other side of the spectrum are cases where the Court carefully considers and explains why a particular group is not being accorded suspect classification status, but nonetheless applies a form of meaningful rational basis review animated by many of the values underlying the very notion of presumptively suspect classes. It is from this small set of exceptional cases that one perhaps can learn the most about the true concerns of equal protection jurisprudence. Further, as explored in part IV, these cases provide a concrete, workable doctrinal and evidentiary framework for giving meaningful review to all equal protection claims.

Although San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez is cited for the proposition that poverty is not a suspect classification, the decision is not particularly helpful in understanding the Court’s suspect classification analysis. The law at issue in the case—a complicated series of tax regulations

\footnote{San Antonio Ind. Sch. Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1 (1973).}
designed to provide adequate funding for school districts throughout the state—did not contain facial classifications of persons, and so arguably did not present the issue squarely in the first place.\textsuperscript{212} Indeed, the Court's primary criticism of the plaintiffs' argument was that the classification at issue was poorly defined, such that it was difficult to analyze for suspect or non-suspect traits. The Court did opine that a classification based on wealth might be too diffuse and diverse to meet suspect classification criteria. But this was not a case where the law clearly defined a classification of persons on its face. Had the law, for example, denied public education to persons below the poverty line, the analysis surely would have taken on a different tone and likely produced a different result.\textsuperscript{213}

\textsuperscript{212} Id. at 19 ("The case comes to us with no definitive description of the classifying facts or delineation of the disfavored class.").

\textsuperscript{213} Neither was this a case where the disfavored group was denied access to a right altogether. Rather, the discrimination involved was relative. Namely, children in the poorest school district in Texas received funding at the level of $456 per pupil,
In assessing the plaintiffs’ contention that the Texas school financing system burdened a suspect classification, the Court at the outset noted that lower courts in many cases had deemed wealth a suspect classification without engaging in any principled analysis of the issue.\textsuperscript{214} The tone of the Court’s discussion very much suggests that it saw its role as reining in power-drunk lower courts that were finding new suspect classifications left and right. Thus, the Court was compelled to analyze “the hard threshold questions” of whether “the class of disadvantaged ‘poor’ [can] be identified or defined in customary equal protection terms.”\textsuperscript{215}

After considering the possible definitions of the affected class, the Court concluded:

\textsuperscript{214} \textit{Id.} at 19 (“the courts in these cases have virtually assumed their findings of a suspect classification through a simplistic process of analysis”).

\textsuperscript{215} \textit{Id.}
The system of alleged discrimination and the class it defines have none of the traditional indicia of suspectness: the class is not saddled with such disabilities, or subjected to such a history of purposeful unequal treatment, or relegated to such a position of political powerlessness as to command extraordinary protection form the majoritarian political process.\textsuperscript{216}

Significantly, this is as much as an indictment of a failed evidentiary presentation as it is a disciplined suspect classification analysis.

The Court also dealt summarily with the claim that age was a suspect classification in its 1976 decision in \textit{Massachusetts Board of Retirement v. Murgia}.\textsuperscript{217} The Court determined that the aged had been subject to some discrimination, but not a sufficient amount—making this assertion without any citation to \textsuperscript{217} 427 U.S. 307, 312 (1976) (stating “[w]e need state only briefly our reasons for agreeing that strict scrutiny is not the proper test” for the plaintiff’s claims).

\textsuperscript{216} \textit{Id.} at 28.

the factual record or precedent. Further, according to the Court, the relevant age—50—was more properly characterized as middle rather than old age. Finally, in conclusory fashion, the Court observed that those in old age were not a "discrete and insular minority" per Carolene Products footnote four. Rather, old age “marks an age that each of us will reach if we live out our normal span.” In the final analysis, old age was not "sufficiently akin to those classifications that we have found suspect."

By contrast, Plyler v. Doe—while denying suspect classification status to the plaintiffs in that case—provides detailed insight into why certain classifications cause concern for the Court. Plyler is among the handful of cases where the Court declined to find a suspect or quasi-suspect class, and therefore decline to apply heightened scrutiny to the plaintiffs' equal

---

218 See Id. at 313.

219 Id.

220 Id. at 313-14.

221 Id. at 314.

protection claim, and yet ultimately ruled for the plaintiffs in the case. Thus, Plyler can be read for its use of the elusive “rational basis with bite” standard, but it can also be read for guidance on what counts as a suspect classification and why.

The law challenged in Plyler was a Texas statute that sought to deny public education to the children of undocumented immigrants. The federal district court in the case made several significant factual findings. First, the court determined that the law did not have “the purpose or effect of keeping illegal aliens out of the State of Texas.” The district court found that increased immigration into the state “had created problems for the public schools of the State, and that these problems were exacerbated by the special educational needs of Mexican children,” although there were other sources of problems as well. Thus, “barring undocumented children from the schools would save money, but it would ‘not necessarily’ improve ‘the quality of education.’” Further, the district court observed that “without an education, these undocumented children, ‘already disadvantaged as a result of poverty, lack of English-speaking ability, and undeniable racial prejudices, . . . will become permanently locked into the lowest socio-economic class.’”

---

224 Plyler, 457 U.S. at 207 (quoting 458 F. Supp. 569, 575 (1978)).

In determining the proper level of scrutiny to apply to the challenged law, the Court reflected on the reasons why certain classifications were treated as suspect:

Some classifications are more likely than others to reflect deep-seated prejudice rather than legitimate rationality in the pursuit of some legitimate objective. Legislation predicated on such prejudice is easily recognized as incompatible with the constitutional understanding that each person is to be judged individually and is entitled to equal justice under the law. Classifications treated as suspect tend to be irrelevant to any proper legislative goal. Finally, certain groups, indeed largely the same groups, have historically been ‘relegated to such a position of political powerlessness as to command extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process.’ The experience of our Nation has shown that prejudice may manifest itself in the treatment of some groups. Our response to that experience is reflected in the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Legislation imposing special disabilities upon groups disfavored by virtue of circumstances beyond their control suggests the kind of “class or caste” treatment that the Fourteenth Amendment was designed to abolish.”

---

What is particularly interesting about Plyler is that, although it ultimately declined to grant suspect classification status, it implemented the same values discussed above in its subsequent application of rational basis review, as discussed in Part IV.

---

Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

Addressing the tension between deference and judicial concern, the Court noted that, at the same time that the Equal Protection Clause “directs that ‘all persons similarly circumstanced shall be treated alike,’” it “does not require things which are different in fact or opinion be treated in law as though they were the same.”\textsuperscript{228} Further, “[t]he initial discretion to determine what is ‘different’ and what is ‘the same’ resides in the legislatures of the states.”\textsuperscript{229} In light of the latitude given to legislatures in this realm, the Court “seek[s] only the assurance that the classification at issue bears some fair relationship to a legitimate public purpose.”\textsuperscript{230}

But the Court recognized that deferential rational basis review does not always get the job done: “[W]e would not be faithful to our obligations under the Fourteenth Amendment if we applied so deferential a standard to every classification. . . .

\textsuperscript{228} Id. 457 U.S. at 216.

\textsuperscript{229} Id.

\textsuperscript{230} Id.
Thus we have treated as presumptively invidious those classifications that disadvantage a ‘suspect class’ . . . .”

The Court next turned its attention to the class at hand. The Court placed blame for the existence of the "shadow population" of undocumented immigrants squarely at the feet of the government, noting its failure to adequately enforce existing immigration laws.

Thus, the Court first implied that adult undocumented immigrants were on some level not entirely responsible for their circumstances, then further determined that the children of immigrants truly could not be held accountable for their

---

231 Id. at 216-17 (“With respect to such classifications, it is appropriate to enforce the mandate of equal protection by requiring the State to demonstrate that its classification has been precisely tailored to serve a compelling state interest.”).

232 Id. at 218 (“This situation raises the specter of a permanent caste of undocumented resident aliens, encouraged by some to remain here as a source of cheap labor, but nevertheless denied the benefits that our society makes available to citizens and lawful residents.”).
undocumented status and presence in the country. “Persuasive arguments support the view that a State may withhold its beneficence from those whose very presence within the United States is the product of their own unlawful conduct. These arguments do not apply with the same force to classifications imposing disabilities on the minor children of such illegal entrants.”

Because, while “[t]heir ‘parents have the ability to conform their conduct to social norms,’ . . . the children who are plaintiffs in these cases ‘can affect neither their parents’ conduct nor their own status.’”

“Even if the State found it expedient to control the conduct of adults by acting on their children, legislation directing the onus of a parent’s misconduct against his children does not comport with fundamental conceptions of justice.”

---

234 Id. at 220 (quoting Trimble v. Gordon, 430 U.S. 762, 770 (1977)).

235 Plyler, 457 U.S. at 220. Here, the Court cited its reasoning in Weber regarding “the basic concept . . . that legal burdens bear
This is one of the clearest statements of a normative justification for designating suspect classifications—and, at the same time, reveals that the normative principle invoked has a much broader and more flexible application than existing rigid suspect classification analysis.

Despite recognizing the inherent concerns with classifications that affect children, the Court noted that “undocumented status is not irrelevant to any proper legislative goal”; “[n]or is undocumented status an absolutely immutable characteristic since it is the product of conscious, indeed unlawful, action.”236

While denying that the subject classification was suspect, the Court continuously reiterated reasons to be concerned about Texas’ statutory scheme. “In addition to the pivotal role of education in sustaining our political and cultural heritage, denial of education to some isolated group of children poses an affront to one of the goals of the Equal Protection Clause: the abolition of some relationship to individual responsibility or wrongdoing.”

236 Plyler, 457 U.S. at 220.
governmental barriers presenting unreasonable obstacles to advancement on the basis of individual merit.”237 The Court further expressed concern that the law would brand the excluded class of children with the “stigma of illiteracy.”238

The Court purported to apply rational basis review, but departed from a traditional application of that standard in a number of ways to strike down the statutory scheme. In his concurrence, Justice Powell noted that the Court’s decision was grounded in the same considerations as the cases addressing discrimination against illegitimate children: “Although the analogy is not perfect, our holding today does find support in decisions of this Court with respect to the status of illegitimates.”239 Justice Powell emphasized that the children were “innocent” with respect to their status.240 On this basis,
Justice Powell contended that the Court’s review in this case was “properly heightened.”

Chief Justice Burger was joined by Justices White, Rehnquist and O’Connor in dissent. The thrust of the dissent pointed to separation of powers concerns. ‘Were it our business to set the Nation’s social policy, I would agree without hesitation that it is senseless for an enlightened society to deprive any children—including illegal aliens—of an elementary education.’ But it was not the role of the Court, Chief Justice Burger argued, to judge the wisdom of social policy. “We trespass on the assigned function of the political branches under our structure of limited and separated powers when we assume a policymaking rule as the Court does today.” Chief Justice Burger further criticized the majority for being unfaithful to precedent, in particular by “patching together bits and pieces of what might be termed quasi-suspect-class and quasi-

\[241\] Id. at 238.

\[242\] Id. at 242 (Burger, J., dissenting).

\[243\] Id.
fundamental-rights analysis, the Court spins out a theory custom-tailored to the facts of these cases.\textsuperscript{244}

The Court’s most thorough exegesis on suspect classification analysis appears in \textit{City of Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center}.\textsuperscript{245} In \textit{Cleburne}, individuals with cognitive disabilities were required by the City to go through a special permitting process to establish a group home. These individuals applied, and were denied the requested permit, based in large part on the fears and stereotypes expressed by neighbors of the proposed group home.

The Court began its analysis by considering the argument that individuals with cognitive disabilities were members of a suspect class.\textsuperscript{246} Laying out the backdrop of precedent, the Court

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{244} \textit{Id.} at 244.
\item \textsuperscript{245} 473 U.S. 432 (1985).
\item \textsuperscript{246} As a related side note, while the Court’s decision in \textit{Heller v. Doe}, 509 U.S. 312 (1993) is sometimes cited for the proposition that mental illness is also not a suspect classification, the Court did not in fact rule on the issue. \textit{See} Julie A. Nice, \textit{Whither the Canaries: On the Exclusion of Poor People from Equal}
\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize}
emphasized that it had declined “to extend heightened review to differential treatment based on age,” characterizing “[t]he lesson of Murgia” as follows:

[W]here individuals in the group affected by the law have distinguishing characteristics relevant to the interests the State has the authority to implement, the courts have been very reluctant, as they should be in our federal system and with respect for the separation of powers, to closely scrutinize legislative choices as to whether, how,
and to what extent those interests should be pursued.\textsuperscript{247}

Thus, drawing on the gender cases as well as Murgia, the Court focused on the inherent relevance of the trait (whether it “bears .

\begin{flushright}
\textit{Constitutional Protection,} 60 Drake L. Rev. 1023, 1055 (2012)
\end{flushright}

(“[T]he Supreme Court did not actually hold that persons with developmental mental disabilities do not constitute a suspect class, as is sometimes claimed.”).

\textsuperscript{247} \textit{Cleburne,} 473 U.S. at 441-42.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

. . [a] relation to ability to perform or contribute to society”)\textsuperscript{248} from the perspective of legislatures. Predictably, the focus on ability stacked the deck in the analysis of disability as a suspect classification.

Indeed, the Court stated at the outset of its analysis that “it is undeniable, and it is not argued otherwise here, that those who are mentally retarded have a reduced ability to cope with and function in the everyday world.”\textsuperscript{249} The Court further emphasized that the group was not homogenous, compromising a “large and diversified group”\textsuperscript{250}—something the Court apparently considered unique to this group, as compared to women, or racial minorities.

The Court determined that the fact that there had been “a distinct legislative response, both national and state, to the plight of those who are mentally retarded”\textsuperscript{251} demonstrated that the group’s concerns were being addressed in the political \textsuperscript{248} Id. at 440-41 (quoting \textit{Frontiero}, 411 U.S. at 686).

\textsuperscript{249} \textit{Cleburne}, 473 U.S. at 442.

\textsuperscript{250} Id.

\textsuperscript{251} Id. at 443.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

process,\textsuperscript{252} and there was not official, state-sponsored antipathy toward the group. The Court concluded that “[s]uch legislation singling out the retarded for special treatment”—that is, legislation addressing the needs of the group—“reflects real and undeniable differences between the retarded and others.”\textsuperscript{253} The \textsuperscript{252} See id. at 445 (“[T]he legislative response . . . negates any claim that the mentally retarded are politically powerless in the sense that they have no ability to attract the attention of lawmakers.”). The paternalistic premise of this observation becomes apparent when one considers whether the “ability to attract the attention of lawmakers” would suffice in the case of women or racial minorities.

\textsuperscript{253} Id. at 444. Accepting this reliance on “real differences” as presumptively permissible conflicts with the Court’s reasoning in the gender cases, where the Court held that (1) even where generalizations are true, they can still be problematic and (2) the existence of “real differences” still merited application of a form of heightened scrutiny—intermediate scrutiny, which recognizes that the existence of “real differences” means that classifications relying on such differences are not per se illegitimate (as is
Court expressed concern that careful examination of laws benefiting those with cognitive disabilities would inhibit lawmakers in their attempts to assist those with cognitive disabilities.\(^\text{254}\)

Concluding that the group was not a suspect class, the Court went on to apply rational basis review to the discrimination at issue. But, as in Plyler, the Court applied a version of rational basis review that expressed commitment to the same values undergirding suspect classification analysis, and ruled in favor of the plaintiffs (see discussion in Part IV below).

A final important example of a court denying suspect classification analysis can be found the Ninth Circuit’s 1990 decision in High-Tech Gays v. Defense Industrial Security virtually the case for the suspect classifications)\(^\text{254}\), but still merit careful, case-by-case examination.

\(^{254}\) See id. at 444-45 ("[M]erely requiring the legislature to justify its efforts in these terms [the terms of heightened scrutiny] may lead it to refrain from acting at all.").
(The Supreme Court has yet to rule on the status of sexual orientation.) Much like Rodriguez and Murgia, the analysis in High Tech Gays is conclusory and dismissive.

Plaintiffs in that case challenged the Department of Defense’s “policy of subjecting all homosexual applicants for Secret and Top Secret clearances to expanded investigations and mandatory adjudications, and . . . the alleged DoD policy and practice of refusing to grant security clearances to known or suspected gay applicants.”256

The DoD regulations provided a detailed and colorful list of criteria for determining eligibility for a clearance:

“[A]ll indications of moral turpitude, heterosexual promiscuity, aberrant, deviant or bizarre sexual conduct or behavior, transvestism [sic], transexualism, indecent exposure, rape, contributing to the delinquency of a

---

256 Id. at 565.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

minor, child molestation, wife-swapping, window peeping, and similar situations from whatever source.”

In addressing the plaintiffs’ argument that sexual orientation was a suspect or quasi-suspect classification meriting heightened equal protection scrutiny, the court first noted that, under the Supreme Court’s 1986 decision in Bowers, “homosexual activity is not a fundamental right protected by substantive due process and that the proper standard of review under the Fifth Amendment is rational basis review.” It further reasoned that “because homosexual conduct can thus be criminalized, homosexuals cannot constitute a suspect or quasi-suspect class entitled to greater than rational basis review for equal protection purposes.”

The Ninth Circuit then engaged in a suspect classification analysis using the now recognized suspect classification criteria.
“To be a ‘suspect’ or ‘quasi-suspect’ class, homosexuals must 1) have suffered a history of discrimination; 2) exhibit obvious,

---

257 Id. at 566-67.

258 Id. at 571.

259 Id.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

immutable, or distinguishing characteristics that define them as a discrete group; and 3) show that they are either a minority or politically powerless, or alternatively that the statutory classification at issue burdens a fundamental right.”

Although the court agreed that homosexuals had suffered a history of discrimination, the court found the other two factors absent. The Court stated summarily, “[h]omosexuality is not an immutable characteristic; it is behavioral and hence fundamentally different from traits such as race, gender, or alienage, which define already existing suspect and quasi-suspect classes.”

Moreover, legislatures have addressed and continue to address the discrimination suffered by homosexuals on account of their sexual orientation through the passage of anti-discrimination legislation. Thus, homosexuals are not without political power.” Accordingly, the court applied rational basis review to the plaintiffs’ claims.

\[260\] Id. at 573.

\[261\] Id.

\[262\] Id. at 574.
In applying rational basis review, the court focused on the plaintiffs' obligation to prove a negative (the absence of a rational basis) and the DoD's lack of obligation to prove anything at all. The court found that “[t]he plaintiffs affidavits and evidence fail to make a sufficient showing that the DoD does not have a rational basis for its expanded security investigation of homosexuals.”

“Under rational basis review as promulgated by the Supreme Court in Cleburne, the DoD is not required to conclusively establish that homosexuals have transmitted classified information for its policy of subjecting homosexual applicants to expanded investigations to be constitutional.”

Various studies offered by plaintiffs (pointing out the small number of homosexual deemed to actually be a security risk) were deemed insufficient to prove the lack of a connection between homosexual identity and valid security concerns. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine what sort of affirmative evidence would be exhaustive enough under deferential rational basis review.

---

263 Id. at 575.

264 Id. at 575.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

What the Ninth Circuit essentially did was engage in a cost-benefit analysis of using the trait of homosexuality as a proxy for conduct that would create a security risk. In contrast to the gender cases, the court did not consider the impact of stereotype and discrimination as part of the cost.

* * *

What does the above exposition on the evolution of suspect classification analysis tell us? First, that underneath the doctrinal superstructure of equal protection jurisprudence lies an implicit recognition that the Court cannot trust itself to root out invidious discrimination through the application of a mundane “rational basis” standard, as was aptly demonstrated by the failure of reasoning Plessy. However, since Plessy, the Court has never directly examined or addressed the inherent folly of applying deferential rational basis review in cases involving facial discrimination against a class of persons. Instead, it attempted to separate out areas of categorical concern (preliminarily identified in Carolene Products footnote four) while leaving all other discriminatory laws subject to what we might properly term “the Plessy test”—that is, deferential rational basis review.
We see that the seminal race cases solidified the concept of suspect classes and the associated need for heightened scrutiny, but, again, because of the unreflective consensus that race discrimination was beyond the pale, the Court failed to fully examine and articulate the underlying theoretical and jurisprudential justifications for creating these categories. This lack of clarity became manifest in the Court's decisions establishing—in fits and starts—the quasi-suspect classifications, as well as the non-suspect classifications. By the time suspect and quasi-suspect classifications became a closed set in 1977, there was still no clear statement of what exactly was required for suspect classification status and why.

\[265\] This Article certainly does not contest that consensus; rather, it questions the dearth of positive reasoning in the precedent explaining why race discrimination is wrong. Without such an accounting, we cannot identify what practices of thought allowed race prejudice to be accepted as just, nor identify evolving and contemporary prejudices.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

III. Discontents

Unsurprisingly, the doctrinal disarray of suspect classification analysis has prompted myriad critiques, as well as attempts to rationalize and account for the doctrine. Responses to suspect classification analysis can be placed on a spectrum from those that tend to preserve the doctrine to those that seek to modify the doctrine to those that seek to abandon it altogether.

A. The Pragmatists

The first category of critiques includes those scholars who do not take issue with suspect classification analysis per se, but instead argue that the doctrine should be read to include certain groups currently not favored with suspect classification analysis.266

266 This is, understandably, also the approach of advocates. See Goldberg, supra note 24, at 525 (noting that, rather than challenge the fundamental doctrinal structures of equal protection analysis, advocates “have sought to satisfy the test for suspect classification rather than urging a new construct that
In particular, there is a rich body of scholarship advocating that sexual orientation be recognized as a suspect classification, beginning as early as 1985, with Carol Steiker’s prescient student note, published in the Harvard Law Review.\textsuperscript{267} In her note, which preceded the Court’s decision in \textit{Bowers},\textsuperscript{268} Steiker argued that the interests of gays and lesbians could not be adequately protected either by rights to privacy or First \textsuperscript{267}Carol Steiker, Note, \textit{The Constitutional Status of Sexual Orientation: Homosexuality as a Suspect Classification}, 98 \textit{Harv. L. Rev.} 1285, 1287 (1985) ("Whereas arguments for privacy and first amendment rights ultimately give way to social consensus, equal protection theory rejects social consensus and the democratic process as the final arbiters of the rightful status of social groups.").

\textsuperscript{268} Although \textit{Bowers} did not directly address the issue, its holding nonetheless effectively precluded recognition of sexual orientation as a suspect classification, at least for the time being.
Amendment rights to free expression. Rather, recognition as a suspect classification was the key to protecting the rights of sexual minorities. Extending this recognition was justified primarily by the extent of discrimination against gays and lesbians, Steiker argued. Steiker also focused on sexual orientation as an aspect of identity as opposed to mere conduct, and ultimately concluded that “[b]ecause homosexuality is a determinative feature of personhood and because gay people have historically been victims of stigmatization and discrimination, courts must subject legislation that classifies on the basis of sexual orientation to a heightened standard of review and must closely scrutinize the state interests embodied in the legislation.”

Since Steiker’s early piece, numerous other scholars have advocated for a similar outcome, although with different

---

269 Steiker, supra note 267, at 1287.

270 Id.

271 Id. at 1305.
For example, some apply the traditional suspect classification criteria, but take issue with interpretation of the emphases. See, e.g., Lori J. Rankin, Ballot Initiatives and Gay Rights: Equal Protection Challenges to the Right’s Campaign Against Lesbians and Gay Men, 62 U. CIN. L. REV. 1055, 1073-78 (1994) (arguing that gay men and lesbians merit suspect classification status under the traditional suspect classification criteria); Courtney A. Powers, Finding LGBTs a Suspect Class: Assessing the Political Power of LGBTs as a Basis for the Court’s Application of Heightened Scrutiny, 17 DUKÉ J. GENDER L. & POL’Y 385 (2010) (“Strong support exists for the argument that statutes distinguishing based on sexual orientation merit heightened review because LGBTs meet the criteria courts have consistently employed to determine whether a class is suspect.”); John Nicodemo, Homosexuals, Equal Protection, and the Guarantee of Fundamental Rights in the New Decade: An Optimist’s Quasi-Suspect View of Recent Events and Their Impact on Heightened Scrutiny for Sexual Orientation-Based Discrimination, 28 TOURO L. REV. 285, 290 (2012) (“Recent and current federal court rulings, legislative actions (and inactions), socio-political mores, and evidence regarding immutability, specifically the contention that sexual orientation was best understood as a behavior rather than an identity.\textsuperscript{273} Others contend that the Court has already implicitly recognized sexual orientation as a suspect classification by applying something more than rational basis review in cases involving sexual orientation discrimination.\textsuperscript{274} general statistics and facts regarding the LGBT community will reveal that sexual orientation, as a classification for equal protection, clearly warrants some level of heightened scrutiny.”).

\textsuperscript{273} Renee Culverhouse, \textit{Homosexuality as a Suspect Class}, 34 S. TEX. L. REV. 205, 240 (1993) (citing scientific literature, Renee argued that “[h]omosexuals do not consciously or unconsciously choose homosexuality. Their sexual orientation is as much a part of them as is that of heterosexuals”).

\textsuperscript{274} Jeremy B. Smith, Note, \textit{The Flaws of Rational Basis With Bite: Why the Supreme Court Should Acknowledge Its Application of Heightened Scrutiny to Classifications Based on Sexual Orientation}, 73 FORDHAM L. REV. 2769, 2770 (2005) (asserting “that the Supreme Court not only ought to make gay men and lesbians a suspect or quasi-suspect class, but that it has in
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

While sexual orientation is perhaps the most examined basis for expanding the canon of suspect classifications, scholars have advanced numerous other groups for recognition, including for individuals who are impoverished, those who are intersex, the elderly, ex-offenders, the homeless, foreign corporations, and students.275

275 See, e.g., Julie A. Nice, Whither the Canaries: On the Exclusion of Poor People from Equal Constitutional Protection, 60 Drake L. Rev. 1023, 1055 (2012) (arguing that the Court should revisit heightened scrutiny for poverty); Chinyere Ezie, Deconstructing the Body: Transgender and Intersex Identities and Sex Discrimination—The Need for Strict Scrutiny, 20 Colum. J. Gender & L. 141, 144 (2011) (offering “a new equal protection doctrine that takes cognizance of the realities of sex, and regards sex categories as a suspect classification, not based on immutability, but on ground of sex categories' very imprecision”); Nina A. Kohn, Rethinking the Constitutionality of Age Discrimination: A Challenge to a Decades-Old Consensus, 44 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 213
(2010) (arguing that the Court should reconsider whether age is a suspect classification because the Court's assessment of the evidence of suspectness in Murgia was faulty); Ben Geiger, The Case for Treating Ex-Offenders as a Suspect Class, 94 Calif. L. Rev. 1191 (2006) (documenting the pervasive marginalization of ex-offenders in American society, and argues that laws singling members of this class out for unique legal burdens ought to be subject to strict scrutiny); Jennifer E. Watson, Note, When No Place is Home: Why the Homeless Deserve Suspect Classification, 501 (2003); Hartwin Bungert, Equal Protection for Foreign and Alien Corporations: Towards Intermediate Scrutiny for a Quasi-Suspect Classification, 59 Mo. L. Rev. 569 (1994) (examining foreign corporations against suspect classification criteria) ("advocate[ing] suspect classification for the homeless according to the criteria determined by the Court"); Leon Letwin, After Goss v. Lopez: Student Status as Suspect Classification?, 29 Stan. L. Rev. 627, 630-31 (1977) (arguing that "the rights of students should be set aside only when compelling state purposes require it, and any such deprivation should be tailored carefully to meet those compelling purposes at minimum cost to constitutional values").
Each of these arguments makes an important contribution to our awareness of the persistence of social group subordination. But by advancing arguments within the suspect classification framework, such analyses necessarily preserve that framework rather than challenge it. Advocating for suspect classification recognition validates the Court’s hierarchical ordering of social groups, sorting between those that are deserving of additional judicial solicitude and those that are not.

B. The Improvers

The second category of critiques includes those arguments that take issue with certain features of suspect classification analysis, but essentially treat it as a coherent doctrinal framework to be worked within, if improved. First and foremost among these critiques is Bruce Ackerman’s important essay, Beyond Carolene Products. In the essay, Ackerman situates the “famous words” of Carolene Products footnote four in the historical context of the struggle over the Court’s legitimacy.
during the first half of the Twentieth Century. Ackerman credits the Carolene Products case with advancing a coherent political theory as well as strategically rehabilitating the Court's role in our democracy. If the Court was previously susceptible to accusations that it defeated majoritarian democracy when it invalidated legislation (the so-called “counter-majoritarian difficulty”), it could now defend judicial activism under certain circumstances as justified by a defective political process. Through this approach, the Court could avoid asserting value judgments about the subject matter of legislation, but instead identify formal features of a defective process.

Ackerman's problem with Carolene Products footnote four is based on his interpretation of it as standing for the proposition

---

276 Bruce A. Ackerman, Beyond Carolene Products, 98 HARV. L. REV. 713, 713 (1985) ("These famous words, appearing in the otherwise unimportant Carolene Products case, came at a moment of extraordinary vulnerability for the Supreme Court.").

277 Id. at 714 ("Rather than look back longingly to a repudiated constitutional order, Carolene brilliantly endeavored to turn the Old Court's recent defeat into a judicial victory.").
that only “discrete and insular minorities” are subject to unfair oppression by the majority, and thus the only candidates for judicial protection. Ackerman refutes this proposition, contending instead that discrete and insular minorities are much better equipped to participate in democratic politics than diffuse minorities. The focus on discrete and insular minorities, Ackerman argues, reflected the blunt mechanisms of political exclusion that existed as of 1938, and fails to address evolving and more subtle forms of political marginalization. Accordingly, Ackerman called for scholars to rethink the discrete and insular minority framework in response to the evolution of pluralist politics in the United States.

Thus, Ackerman redefines those groups with which the Equal Protection Clause should be concerned (and suggests a “sliding scale of Carolene concern,” a concept that is pleasingly alliterative, but difficult to imagine the Court articulating and 278 Because the footnote is dicta, and because there is nothing in the content or structure of the note to suggest that its list of areas of concerns is exhaustive, this is itself a contestable proposition.

implementing in any principled manner). He does not, however, fundamentally question the judiciary’s competence to determine as a matter of fact or law the political situation of a given social group. Indeed, Ackerman explicitly disclaims any interest in questioning the essential premise of footnote four: that some groups should be entitled to presumptive judicial solicitude while discrimination against other groups is presumptively permissible.\footnote{279}{Ackerman openly states, “My aim here . . . is to work out the doctrinal implications of the \textit{Carolene} formula rather than to criticize its foundations.” Ackerman, \textit{supra} note 276, at 722.}

While Ackerman’s critique focused on the discrete and insular minority criterion, Janet Halley, writing in 1994, tackled the immutability factor, specifically in the context of evaluating sexual orientation as a potential suspect classification.\footnote{280}{Janet E. Halley, \textit{Sexual Orientation and the Politics of Biology: A Critique of the Argument from Immutability}, 46 \textit{Stan. L. Rev.} 503 (1994).} Halley noted that scholars and advocates had engaged in heated debate over whether the trait of sexual orientation was, in fact, immutable. Halley emphasized, however, that the Court did not treat immutability as a firm requirement for suspect classification designation in practice. She further argued that by attempting to prove the immutability of sexual orientation—while perhaps advantageous in the short-term—advocates risked misrepresenting and dividing the gay community. Again, this critique raises important questions about constitutional theory and strategy, but stops short of questioning the legitimacy of using factors like immutability to draw distinctions between social groups and determine the extent to which they merit special protection from the courts.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

Arguing in a similar vein, William Eskridge contended in 2010 that political powerlessness—supposedly the crux of Carolene Products footnote four and the very justification for judicial intervention in equal protection cases—was not, in truth, a requirement of suspect classification designation.281 Eskridge 281 See Eskridge, supra note 22. In the same volume, Richard Levy responded to Eskridge’s contentions by pointing to instances where the Court did examine considerations of political power.

See Richard E. Levy, Political Process and Individual Fairness begins by noting the paradoxical nature of the political powerlessness criterion, as viewed in the particular context of sexual orientation and marriage equality:

Gay rights advocates have spent a generation seeking political advances for sexual minorities—yet now find themselves arguing that gay men, lesbians, and bisexuals are “politically powerless.” During the same time period, traditionalists have sought to block gay power—yet now say that “homosexuals” are political powerhouses.\textsuperscript{282}

In attempting to explain this conundrum, Eskridge describes the manner in which, as a historical proposition, suspect classifications based on race, gender and alienage were recognized \textit{not} when the groups at issue truly lacked any political power, but when they had accumulated enough political power to be noticed. Indeed, Eskridge argues, neither immutability nor political powerlessness—the two criteria

\begin{flushright}
\textit{Rationales in the U.S. Supreme Court's Suspect Classification Jurisprudence,} 50 Washburn L.J. 33 (2010).
\end{flushright}

\textsuperscript{282} Eskridge, \textit{supra} note 22, at 1.
supposedly most troubling in the case of sexual orientation—have truly been enforced as suspect classification requirements by the Court. Rather, the Court looks at three quite different criteria: (1) is the class defined by the trait a coherent social group; (2) has the class suffered a history of state-sponsored discrimination; and (3) is the trait one that generally does not contribute to legitimate public policies.\footnote{283}

Eskridge’s argument is both descriptive and normative. First, he contends that the Court has not, as a matter of historical fact, required that a group actually be politically powerless to attain a suspect classification designation. Second, he asserts that, if the Court were to intervene on behalf of groups that are truly political powerless, it would be “too far ahead of political opinion” and thus risk illegitimacy and public backlash.\footnote{284}

---

\footnote{283} This begs the question—addressed squarely by \textit{Cleburne}—of why Courts should consider only the categorical issue of whether a trait is "generally" relevant to legislative goals, versus the specific issue of whether a trait is relevant to the precise legislative goals asserted in any given case.

\footnote{284} Eskridge, \textit{supra} note 22, at 25-26
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

Eskridge’s concern with judicial restraint is well-founded, but it avoids the twin questions of (1) whether such restraint should perhaps be modified in the case of equal protection challenges and (2) what costs are incurred when the Court cannot recognize and protect those groups in our society that are the most marginalized, the most despised, and the most disenfranchised.

C. The Disassemblers

Scholars who fall into the final category of critiques are more actively hostile to suspect classification analysis and its incoherence, and propose abandoning the framework altogether.

These scholars abandon efforts to rationalize or improve upon existing suspect classification analysis, and instead highlight the inconsistencies and contradictions plaguing the doctrine. For example, in a 2011 article, Marcy Strauss thoroughly documents the extent to which “[t]he Supreme Court has not provided a coherent explanation for precisely what factors trigger heightened scrutiny.” Strauss contends that the absence of a coherent, disciplined test enables judicial manipulation of the doctrine.\textsuperscript{286} She seeks to “comprehensively and systematically expose the flaws, confusion, and unanswered questions that inure in the criteria for assessing suspect and nonsuspect classes.”\textsuperscript{287} At the conclusion of Strauss’ thought-provoking piece, one is left with the conclusion that suspect classification analysis is difficult to explain, much less justify.

285 Strauss, supra note 21, at 138.

Perhaps the most comprehensive and damning critique of suspect classification analysis can be found in Suzanne Goldberg’s 2004 article, \textit{Equality Without Tiers}.\textsuperscript{288} Goldberg’s critique was spurred in part by the Court’s affirmative action decisions in \textit{Grutter v. Bollinger}\textsuperscript{289} and \textit{Gratz v. Bollinger}\textsuperscript{290} in which the Court reiterated its commitment to applying strict scrutiny in a symmetrical fashion. That is, laws explicitly

\footnotesize

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{286} \textit{Id.} at 140 (“The ambiguity surrounding equal protection analysis produces incoherent results.”).
  \item \textsuperscript{287} \textit{Id.} at 141.
  \item \textsuperscript{288} Goldberg, \textit{supra}, note 24.
  \item \textsuperscript{289} 539 U.S. 306 (2003).
  \item \textsuperscript{290} 539 U.S. 244 (2003).
\end{itemize}
implementing race discrimination (non-existent for the past several decades, although laws with a discriminatory impact persist) and those attempting to ameliorate race discrimination (affirmative action measures) are both subjected to strict scrutiny—which typically leads to the law being struck.\textsuperscript{291} Goldberg questioned whether this acontextual application of strict scrutiny was justified, and examined the foundations of suspect classification analysis to determine the answer.

The resulting tour through suspect classification jurisprudence reveals a profoundly inconsistent framework, beset by “intractable internal contradictions.”\textsuperscript{292} Most significantly, one of the primary justifications for recognizing and extending special protection to suspect classifications is that the excluded class has suffered a history of discrimination. And yet under this theory, it makes little sense to treat as suspect (and apply heightened scrutiny to) laws that discriminate against whites in the context of race discrimination, or against men in the context of gender discrimination. A reasonable explanation for symmetry is the notion that certain traits are always irrelevant to law-making, but then what role remains for the history of discrimination factor of suspect classification analysis? How can the two justifications—one historical and the other decidedly ahistorical—be reconciled? Indeed, implicit in the focus on a history of discrimination is the notion that suspect classification designation is a type of remedial measure. How then, can this judicial remedy be used to prohibit legislatively enacted remedial measures (that is, affirmative action)?

\textsuperscript{291} Goldberg, \textit{supra} note 24 at 482.

\textsuperscript{292} \textit{Id.} at 485.

Goldberg’s proposed solution is to develop a single standard of review for all equal protection claims. Goldberg’s proposed standard focuses on enhancing the consideration of context and eliminating reliance on generalizations. She does not, however, explicitly engage the issue of which party should bear the burden of proof under her test. Nor does Goldberg discuss what would count as evidence under her test, or suggest that the standard would “ban . . . judicial hypothesizing.” As discussed below, these issues—the burden of proof and the role of judicial speculation—are at the heart of modern equal protection jurisprudence’s failings, and must be addressed by any effort at doctrinal reform.

\[293\] \textit{Id.} at 504: “Heightened scrutiny is applied regardless of whether the classified group has suffered oppression.”
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

Further, in a curious move, Goldberg characterizes the tiers of scrutiny a “‘training’ tool for courts during an era when they lacked an inclination or ability to identify bias or outmoded stereotypes within familiar classifications.” This seems to assume that courts have evolved in this respect—an assumption that does not appear to be grounded in reality. If we take Reva Siegel’s thesis of “preservation through transformation” seriously, then courts need to be ever more vigilant and forward-

\[294\] Id. at 555.

\[295\] Id. at 493 (“[T]he three tiers [of equal protection scrutiny] may be understood best in historical terms; that is, they may have served as a ‘training’ tool for the Supreme Court and lowers courts that lacked an inclination or ability to identify bias or outmoded stereotypes within familiar classifications.”).
looking to really do the job of protecting against impermissible prejudice becoming enshrined in the law.

The following Section documents what these earlier critiques have yet to address: (1) a precise description of the affirmative harm that suspect classification analysis inflicts; (2) an alternative reading of the precedent for evidence of transcendent values; and (3) a proposed doctrinal solution that is underexplored, but firmly grounded in the Court’s precedent.

IV. TRANSCENDENT VALUES

This Article agrees with the assertions of other scholars that suspect classification analysis is incoherent and difficult—if not impossible—to justify. The following Section goes further to describe the way in which the doctrine affirmatively preserves and justifies evolving forms of discrimination. It then performs an alternative reading of the precedent to identify themes in reasoning that transcend the context of any one case, and point to larger values animating the Court’s equal protection jurisprudence. Finally, it proposes a doctrinal framework, based on the Court’s 1985 decision in Plyler and in Cleburne, that successfully embodies those values.
A. The Fundamental Illegitimacy of Suspect Classification Analysis

It is by now beyond argument that suspect classification analysis is rife with inconsistencies and contradictions. Further, despite the best efforts of scholars to provide the Court with an overarching theoretical justification for the doctrine, the Court’s own inconsistent application and explanation of the doctrine, paired with its general reluctance to justify it at all, ultimately defeat these efforts. The doctrine’s origins are both remote and opaque; its subsequent development was chaotic and under-theorized.

But the doctrine is more than incoherent. In keeping with Reva Siegel’s theory of preservation through transformation, suspect classification analysis goes beyond failing to promote equality to actively sustain structures of inequality. First and most importantly, the fundamental premise of suspect classification is that it is presumptively permissible to facially discriminate against social groups unless the Supreme Court declares otherwise. There is nothing in the history or text of the Equal Protection Clause—or in footnote four of Carolene Products—to suggest this is correct.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

It is true of course that the Equal Protection Clause was originally intended to prevent state-sponsored discrimination against one social group in particular: emancipated slaves. But the Court has long held that the provision should be interpreted as serving the larger purpose of preventing all forms of state-sponsored invidious discrimination. Once this step is taken, it is not at all apparent that the Court should be essentially ranking social groups with respect to one another to achieve this mission. Stated another way, is it the nature of the group being discriminated against that makes the discrimination invidious, or the nature of the discrimination itself?

By comparing social groups to one another and sorting them into suspect and non-suspect classes, the Court itself engages in discriminatory, hierarchical ordering of these social groups with respect to one another. Worse yet, this ordering is virtually permanent. Rather than analyzing the relevance of a particular trait in the context of a specific discriminatory action, the Court declares certain classes suspect for all time. And although this designation is based on history, it then becomes permanent and ahistorical, applied with symmetry to subordinated and non-subordinated groups, and unlikely to be subject to reexamination. On the other side of the equation, once a group has been declared non-suspect, the binding force of precedent discourages reconsideration. The fact that suspect classification status is a permanent rather than contextual designation increases its impact, and in this sense its value, making it more likely to be seen and treated as a scarce doctrinal resource.

Treating suspect classification status and heightened scrutiny as scarce resources that must be guarded in turn preserves excessively deferential rational basis review as the default standard. The distinction drawn between heightened scrutiny and rational basis review constantly and unreflectively reinforces the notion that the vast majority of facial discrimination against social groups is presumptively permissible.

In addition to enforcing this presumption, suspect classification analysis calls upon the Court to evaluate realities outside of judicial competence. Even if the Court were to rely on expert testimony to assess political powerlessness (as opposed to its normal practice of simply eye-balling the issue, presumably based on the justices’ subjective perceptions), this is not the sort of thing that Courts should be ruling on, much less enshrining into permanent doctrine. Political realities are constantly shifting over time. Further, questions of “immutability”—vis-à-vis sexuality, gender and race\textsuperscript{296}—are hotly contested and ever-evolving.

Perhaps the most significant respect in which modern equal protection jurisprudence calls upon the courts to rule on matters outside of judicial competence is in applying the utterly unprincipled standard of deferential rational basis review. Rational basis review is justified on a number of bases, including conservation of judicial resources. But this is misleading, because the utter lack of principle or constraint in the standard means that the Court reaches inconsistent results, which fail to provide meaningful guidance to legislatures going forward. Were the Court to apply meaningful review in all equal protection cases, it could articulate a principled standard for what constitutes a relevant means-ends fit, which legislatures could then use as a guide in tailoring their efforts.

\textsuperscript{296} Indeed, one could argue that race identity was patently indeterminate at the time of \textit{Plessy}, where Plessy himself was legally designated as “Negro” although this was not discernable in his appearance.

B. Transcendent Values

Worse than failing to implement a coherent vision of equality, the doctrinal structures of equal protection analysis actively thwart recognition of inequality. But this is not to say that the Court’s jurisprudence in this area is entirely devoid of principled guidance. However, to perceive these larger themes, one must take several steps back and read the Court’s precedent not for the discrete (and arguably haphazard) doctrinal innovations of each case, but for the expression of equal protection values that transcend the current doctrinal superstructure.

There are three primary themes expressed in the Court’s equal protection jurisprudence that focus on the constitutive power of the laws. These themes are (1) proper construction of the individual; (2) proper construction of the state (specifically the legislative branch); and (3) proper construction of the Court itself. The first two themes are clearly important in terms of reflecting our democratic commitments, but the third is perhaps the most critical, as it is the filter for recognizing and expressing the other two. Further, it is the least explored and acknowledged of the themes, due to the Court’s resistance to recognizing its own agency in not only interpreting but creating the meaning of the Equal Protection Clause.

The first transcendent theme or value we see expressed in suspect classification analysis is a concern with proper constitution of the individual. Individuals in our society should be regarded as individuals first, and members of groups second. The gender cases in particular support this proposition, acknowledging that even where stereotypes are “accurate,” they nonetheless degrade individuals and society as a whole.

Individuals should also be free to better themselves, as was emphasized in Plyler. They should bear burdens that grow out of matters under their control (their conduct) rather than matters out of their control (their status)—a point presented most clearly in the illegitimacy cases.

To preserve these prerogatives of individuals, suspect classification analysis also describes the proper role for the state. The state may not wield its power in a manner that is arbitrary. When suspicion of arbitrariness is afoot, the state must provide reasoned justifications for its actions. The state must maintain a neutral stance toward the populace. And it must serve public purposes, and may not become a vehicle for expressing and enforcing private biases.

Finally, suspect classification analysis also suggests the proper constitution of the Court. It cannot be denied that the most prominent feature is the command of deference. This is the centerpiece of cases like Carolene Products, FCC v. Beach Communications, and Heller v. Doe (as well as, of course, Plessy). Commitment to both federalism and separation of powers demands that the Court begin from the starting point of assuming the propriety of legislative action. In the context of equal protection analysis, suspect classification and heightened scrutiny, are the closely-guarded exceptions to this rule.

It is apparent, however, that the rhetoric of deference often serves to cloak the Court’s own agency. For example, when the Court speculates as to justifications for a law under rational basis review—justifications that the legislature has not articulated or advanced itself—it invades the sphere of policy. So too the very essence of suspect classification analysis—assessing the relative political power and social position of various groups—is firmly situated in policy concerns.

Further, by failing to articulate a coherent theoretical justification for suspect classification analysis, the Court reserves to itself a great deal of flexibility in reaching particular outcomes. This makes decisions of the Court unpredictable, difficult to reconcile, and of little use in guiding legislatures.

In fact, the Court would remain more properly in its role and out of the political sphere were it to articulate and apply clear and consistent standards for detecting that discrimination that is “invidious.” But instead, the Court elaborately play-acts deference in a manner that in fact reserves tremendous power to it.

There are three bases for reconsidering the role of deference in equal protection analysis. The first is that the Equal Protection Clause itself granted explicit permission to abandon the usual deference accorded to the legislative branches and, specifically, to the states. Based on the history, purpose and underlying values of the Equal Protection Clause, this exception to the rule should be limited to cases involving facial classifications of persons (as opposed to discrimination in the commercial context).

This is the second bases on which to reconsider deference with respect to equal protection claims: the cases where the Court most strongly expressed the rule of deference have generally been cases dealing with discrimination between things rather than between persons—the striking exception being Heller v. Doe, which dealt with persons, but articulated a radically deferential version of rational basis review. It is significant to note, however, that in articulating this version of rational basis review, the Heller cases cited almost exclusively commercial cases.

The third basis for abandoning excessive deference where a law relies on facial classifications of persons is that this standard undermines the core strengths (and sources of legitimacy) of the judicial branch. It eschews concrete evidence for untethered speculation; abandons the truth-producing function of the adversarial process; is open to judicial manipulation; and fails to provide clear guidance to lower courts or to legislatures.
The counterpoint to rational basis review—heightened scrutiny—is designed to assure that courts reason through the permissibility of a discriminatory classification to avoid succumbing to contemporary prejudices. It is this commitment to reason-forcing doctrinal structures that should be seen as the transcendent value expressed in the Court’s suspect classification jurisprudence vis-à-vis the proper role of the courts, and it should be applied broadly, not guarded for use only in cases where there is already social consensus that prejudice is afoot.

C. Doctrinal Solutions

We have identified the problems. Deferential rational basis review is the standard of

Plessy

and is a standard actively hostile to reasoned analysis. The development of suspect classification analysis and the tiers of scrutiny preserved rather than dismantled this pernicious doctrine. Further, as suspect classification status and heightened scrutiny came to be seen as scarce resources, more and more claims were directed into deferential rational basis review. Because it is an ill-formed doctrine, rational basis review permits excessive manipulation.
As suggested above, the Court invokes the concept of deference, but in fact suspect classification analysis embroils the Court in undisciplined and often unfounded speculation about social reality—the very realm of policy that is to be left to the legislature. Further, it is not at all clear that this (mock) adherence to deference is warranted. The very premise of the Equal Protection Clause is that principles of both federalism and separation of powers must be abrogated in circumstances where majority political interests are subordinating minority political interests.

Cases like Carolene Products, Loving and Hernandez do not stand to the contrary. Rather, each of these can be read to suggest a much more fundamental distinction between cases involving discrimination in the commercial context (to which deferential rational basis review is properly applied) versus discrimination between classes of persons (which invokes genuine equal protection concerns). The reasons for 297 See, e.g., U.S. v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 606 (1995) (citing Carolene Products among other cases) (“In the years following these decisions, deference to legislative policy judgments on deference—respect for the majoritarian process and federalism—are not present where a law relies on a classification of persons, thereby invoking the special rules and considerations of the Equal Protection Clause.

---

If we abandon the notion that extreme deference is appropriate in cases involving classifications of persons, the discussion can be re-focused on a proper, functional, and principled evidentiary standard for detecting invidious discrimination. Indeed, while critics have focused on the lax substantive standards of rational basis review (virtually any interest related to the police power is legitimate, and the “rationally related” requirement appears to have no content whatsoever), the greatest difficulty comes from the burden of proof associated with the standard. The most profound shift between heightened scrutiny and rational basis review is not the nature of the means-ends analysis, but the fact that the burden is commercial regulation became the powerful theme under both the Due Process and Commerce Clauses, and in due course that deference became articulate in the standard of rationality review.”).
placed on the plaintiff not only to prove a negative, but to prove the negative of an entirely hypothetical state of affairs. This approach does not make sense from the perspective of implementing the values of the Equal Protection Clause, and it does not make sense as good evidentiary practice.

There is precedent that offers an alternative path. As alluded to above, the Court’s decisions in Plyler and Cleburne provide a comprehensive treatise on the nature of suspect classification analysis and the normative principles underlying it. But these cases also provides something else: a model of meaningful rational basis review that draws on the strengths of suspect classification analysis (its effort to force reasoned analysis) while avoiding its follies.

Applying rational basis review in Plyler, the Court stuttered a bit in announcing the standard of review, stating that the law “could hardly be considered rational” (using the language of rational basis review) “unless it furthers some substantial goal of the State” (using the language of intermediate scrutiny).298

298 Plyler, 457 U.S. at 224.
The Court conceded that undocumented status was presumptively relevant to legitimate legislative goals, and for this reason the classification was not suspect per se. But in a form of contextualized rational basis review, the Court found no connection between this presumptively relevant trait and the interests being regulated by the law—the State’s interest in maintaining the quality of public education and the children’s interest in receiving public education. (Under traditional rational basis review, the mere existence of a generally relevant trait, in addition to the mere existence of some plausible state interest would be sufficient. The Court typically does not actually examine whether there is a connection between the two.) The idea is that laws that invoke classifications unrelated to the interests being regulated likely create arbitrary and oppressive class distinctions.

The Court rejected the notion that Congress’ disapproval of undocumented immigrants created a blanket license to discriminate against them.299 The Court in essence demanded affirmative evidence in congressional policy supporting the notion that states could give effect to federal immigration policy by denying education to undocumented children. It found no such support. Significantly, the Court appeared to shift the burden of proof to the State: “the State must demonstrate that the classification is reasonably adapted to ‘the purposes for which the state desires to use it.’”

---

299 See id. at 224-25.

In examining the State’s justifications for the law, the Court rejected the contention that a concern for conserving resources alone could justify resort to facial classifications: “The State must do more than justify its classification with a concise expression of an intention to discriminate.” Regarding the State’s purported interests in “protect[ing] itself from an influx of illegal immigrants,” the Court determined that the law was “hardly . . . an effective method” for accomplishing this goal, and noted that “[t]here is no evidence in the record suggesting that

\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 225-26.}

\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 226 (citation omitted).}

\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 227 ("Of course, a concern for the preservation of resources standing alone can hardly justify the classification used in allocating those resources.").}
illegal entrants impose any significant burden on the State’s economy.” 303 Similarly: “the record in no way supports the claim that exclusion of undocumented children is likely to improve the overall quality of education in the State.” 304 “[T]he State failed to offer any ‘credible supporting evidence that a proportionately small diminution of the funds spent on each child . . . will have a grave impact on the quality of education.” 305

The Court required the State to justify its exclusion of this group: “[E]ven if improvement in the quality of education were a likely result of barring some number of children from the schools of the State, the state must support its selection of this group as the appropriate target for exclusion.” 306 The State could not do so, because the district court had found that the excluded class of children were “basically indistinguishable” from other children. 307

303 Id. at 228.

304 Id. at 229.

305 Id. at 229 (quoting 501 F. Supp. at 538).

306 Id. 229.

307 Id. at 229 (citations omitted).
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

The State provided yet another justification for the law: that undocumented children were more likely to leave the State, such that it was less desirable to invest in their education. The Court rejected this justification as “difficult to quantify” and insufficient to counterbalance “the creation and perpetuation of a subclass of illiterates within our boundaries.” This form of rational basis review asks whether the excluded class is different in a way that matters with respect to the interests being regulated.

Similarly, in Section III of Cleburne, the Court conducted a thorough analysis of whether those with cognitive disabilities ought to be considered a suspect class. In Section IV of the opinion, the Court proceeded to apply what was allegedly rational basis review, but which in fact departed from traditional rational basis review in several important respects.

Traditional rational basis review does not ask whether a classification is over- or under-inclusive. It does not ask whether other groups could just as easily be regulated. Indeed, according to some commentators, traditional rational basis review truly requires no tailoring at all, in that the Court, having found a legitimate governmental interest justifying the law, often does not even go on to look for a rational relationship.

308 See id. at 230.

309 Id.

But in Cleburne, the Court began its rational basis review by noting that

The city does not require a special use permit . . .

for apartment houses, multiple dwellings, boarding and lodging houses, fraternity or sorority houses, dormitories, apartment hotels, hospitals, sanitariums, nursing homes for convalescents or the aged . . ., private clubs or fraternal orders, and other specified uses.\(^\text{310}\)

The Court then questioned: "May the city require the permit for this facility when other care and multiple-dwelling facilities are freely permitted?"\(^\text{311}\)

This inquiry, standing alone, already goes further in requiring the government to articulate a reason for differential

\(^{310}\) Cleburne, 473 U.S. at 447.

\(^{311}\) Id. at 448.
The Court reiterated the conclusion of its suspect classification analysis: “that the mentally retarded as a group are indeed different from others.”312 But the Court went on to observe that “this difference is largely irrelevant unless the Featherstone home and those who would occupy it would threaten legitimate interests of the city in a way that other permitted uses… would not.”313

Significantly, the Court looked to the record for evidence of any “special threat” posed by the Featherstone residents, and found none.314 This matters because, under traditional rational

312 Id.

313 Id.

314 Id. (“Because in our view the record does not reveal any rational basis for believing that the Featherstone home would pose any special threat to the city’s legitimate interests, we affirm the judgment below insofar as it holds the ordinance invalid as applied in this case.”); see also id. at 450 (“[T]his record does not clarify how, in this connection, the characteristics of the intended occupants of the Featherstone home rationally justify denying to those occupants what would basis review, the evidence in the record (or absent from it) places no constraint on the Court, as it is free to imagine reasons why the legislature might have enacted a particular law, regardless of whether the legislature considered or advanced such reasons.

The Court examined the City's justifications for its decision to deny the permit, several of which—concerns about the location in a flood plain, overcrowding, fire hazards, and legal liability for the residents' actions—were patently legitimate governmental interests. But the Court required more. It required the City to justify its decision to single out the Featherstone residents with respect to these concerns. The Court placed the burden squarely on City to support this distinction, noting, for example, that "[t]he City never justifies its apparent view that other people can live under such 'crowded' conditions when mentally retarded persons cannot."\(^{315}\) Combined with other, illegitimate concerns (namely, "negative attitudes" on the part of neighboring residents), the Court determined that the denial of the permit rested on nothing other than “irrational prejudice,” and struck the law as failing rational basis review.\textsuperscript{316}

\(^{315}\) Id. (quoting the Court of Appeals, 726 F.2d at 202).

Under traditional rational basis review, once it is noted that a group is different in a way that is generally relevant to legislative goals—that is, the group is determined to be a non-suspect class—the legislature has free rein to treat the group differently. So long as the challenged law can be claimed to serve a legitimate state interest—real or imagined—it passes constitutional muster. There is typically no further examination of the relationship between the trait and the purported governmental interest. In short, once the government offers, or the Court imagines, a legitimate interest, any group can be singled out for differential treatment\textsuperscript{317}—except, of course, the

\footnotesize{\textsuperscript{316}Cleburne, 473 U.S. at 450.}

\footnotesize{\textsuperscript{317}Concurring in part and dissenting in part, Justice Marshall noted, “Cleburne's ordinance surely would be valid under the traditional rational-basis test applicable to economic and commercial regulation.” Id. at 456 (Marshall, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). Justice Stevens wrote separately to} assert that rational basis review was always sufficient to identify impermissible legislation, such that multiple tiers of scrutiny were unnecessary. Justice Marshall, by contrast, wrote separately to encourage the Court to recognize that it had, in fact, applied heightened scrutiny, and to articulate its reasons for doing so. Citing cases involving discrimination in the commercial context, Justice Marshall noted that traditional rational basis review essentially permits a legislature to arbitrarily choose one group before others in addressing concerns of general applicability. See Id. at 458 “The ‘record’ is said not to support the ordinance’s classifications, but under the traditional standard we do not sift through the record to determine whether policy decisions are squarely supported by a firm factual foundation.” Id. “In normal circumstances, the burden is not on the legislature to convince the Court that the lines it has drawn are sensible . . . .” See id. at 459. Justice Marshall again referenced cases of commercial discrimination to support the contention that rational basis review does not require any degree of precision in classifications. Justice Marshall went on to argue that the Court should use a flexible approach based on various very small set of groups the Court has recognized as suspect or quasi-suspect classifications. Everyone else is fair game.

The innovation of Plyler and Cleburne decisions was to require a discernible, affirmative connection between the specific trait that defines the classification and the precise interests at issue in the legislation. Furthermore, it was not only the government’s interests in the subject matter of the legislation that mattered; the individual’s interest must be considered as well.

factors, including the interests involved and the level of prejudice that existed against a group. “In light of the importance of the interest at stake and the history of discrimination the retarded have suffered, the Equal Protection Clause requires us to do more than review the distinctions drawn by Cleburne’s zoning ordinance as if they appeared in a taxing statute or in economic or commercial legislation.” See id. at 464. Ultimately, Justice Marshall criticized the majority for trying to permanently “fix” the level of scrutiny for a given classification, noting that discriminatory classifications had different meanings in different contexts. Id. at 468-69.
Suspect Classification and Its Discontents

The Court’s analysis in these cases displayed three significant features: (1) it placed the burden on the government to provide evidence of justification for the discriminatory action; (2) it did not rely on judicial speculation to provide justifications for the law; and (3) it gave content to the second prong of rational basis review—the tailoring prong—by requiring that there be an affirmative connection between the trait identifying the classification and both the government’s interest in regulating the benefit at issue and the individual’s interest in having access to that benefit.

This context-specific variation of suspect-classification analysis can be thought of as “micro-suspect classification” analysis:

The analysis performed in Cleburne was a “micro” suspect classification analysis in that it did not seek to declare the classification suspect for all time (indeed, the Cleburne Court declined to designate persons with cognitive disabilities as a suspect class, largely because the defining trait would often be relevant to valid legislative goals), but instead looked at the validity of the classification in light of the interests at stake in that particular case.\footnote{318}{See Pollvogt, supra note 23, at 927 (describing micro-suspect classification analysis as one way the Court determined the presence of impermissible animus).}

The most significant aspect of micro-suspect classification analysis is that it eliminates the essentially irrebuttable presumption that it is constitutionally permissible for laws to facially discriminate against social groups. Second, it creates a mechanism by which plaintiffs can rebut any persistent presumption of constitutionality. Third, it shifts the Court into the position of considering real, concrete evidence that is within judicial competence. Finally, it forces reasons—on the part of the legislature and on the part of the courts.

V. CONCLUSION

[T]hat a characteristic may be relevant under some or even many circumstances does not suggest any reason to presume it relevant under other circumstances where there is reason to suspect it is not. A sign that says ‘men only’ looks very different on a bathroom door than a courthouse door.\footnote{\textit{Cleburne}, 473 U.S. 469-70 (Marshall, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).}

Justice Marshall’s comment is significant on at least two levels. First, it is a prime example of the evolution of standards of fairness and equal treatment. In 1985, it was plausible for Justice Marshall to claim that labeling bathroom doors with gender assignments was uncontroversial; in 2013, this is an issue of serious debate.

Second, Justice Marshall expressed a truth that transcends the specific facts of his example. The dynamics of impermissible discrimination are fluid and context-specific. They are not amenable to fixed categorization. They require exploration through concrete, real evidence (rather than untethered judicial speculation) such that the \textit{reasons} for any particular act of discrimination can be offered, examined, and assessed.