Govt-NSCN peace pact: Another accord of discord?

By Kishor Kumar

A meeting that was supposed to clear the air on the Nagaland issue ended up creating a storm.

On Wednesday, the government announced it had signed an accord with the National Socialist Council of Nagaland (NSCN) to settle a dispute that had raged for decades. The accord, which was signed by the government and the NSCN, is intended to put an end to the long-running conflict that has claimed the lives of thousands of people, including civilians.

However, the accord has been met with skepticism and criticism from various groups, including the Nagaland Tribes Council (NTC), which has been a long-time opponent of the government's efforts to settle the conflict.

The accord was signed in New Delhi, and it is expected to be followed by a framework agreement in the near future. The framework agreement is expected to outline the terms and conditions of the accord, as well as the steps that will be taken to implement it.

The accord is seen as a major step forward in the efforts to resolve the Nagaland issue, which has been a source of tension and conflict for many years. However, some groups have expressed concern about the accord, and have called for more time to consider its implications.

The accord is expected to be implemented in phases, with the first phase to be completed in the next six months. The government has said that it is committed to implementing the accord as soon as possible, and that it will work closely with the NSCN to ensure that it is carried out successfully.

The accord is expected to have a significant impact on the lives of the people of Nagaland, and it is hoped that it will bring peace and stability to the region.

However, some groups have expressed concern about the accord, and have called for more time to consider its implications. It remains to be seen how the accord will be received by the people of Nagaland, and how it will be implemented.
