Urban bias aplenty

In my opinion, RBI Governor is not appropriate for the country... (His inability to centrally manage the industry and rise of unemployment...)

Making doctors of medical students

Whether it is the CET, COMED or NEET, a student’s attitude and inclination to become a doctor is not tested.

By Vinita Venkataraman

I wonder if any other country so far has so many hurdles in the process of getting into the medical profession. There were several admissions with the mandatory test such as NEET and CET. Even after clearing the test, students had to go through a tough selection process to get into one of the medical colleges. After the CET, the student has to clear the medical college interview and the personal interview. After the interview, the student has to wait for the seat allocation. The whole process is so torturous for the students.

While colleges are segregating students into the best and the worst on the basis of scores, the authorities are taking their time to select the students. Some of the most prestigious medical colleges have set up full-fledged medical admission committees. In the recent years, the medical admission process has been streamlined to reduce the number of hurdles. But still, the process is so complicated that students have to work hard to get into the medical profession.

To make things worse, the medical students have to face a lot of pressure from the medical boards and the government. The students have to face a lot of pressure to clear the medical board examinations. Some of the medical boards have set up medical board committees to ensure the quality of education. The students have to face a lot of pressure to get into the medical profession.

The medical students are not only facing pressure from the medical boards but also from their own families. The parents of the medical students are always pressuring them to work hard and get into the medical profession. The medical students have to face a lot of pressure to clear the medical board examinations.

The medical students have to face a lot of pressure to get into the medical profession because of the high demand for doctors. The government has set up a lot of medical colleges to increase the number of medical students. The government has set up a lot of medical colleges to increase the number of medical students. The government has set up a lot of medical colleges to increase the number of medical students.

Prejudices that have fuelled this fear are the following:

1. The medical profession is considered to be a prestigious profession.

2. The medical profession is considered to be a high-paying profession.

3. The medical profession is considered to be a demanding profession.

4. The medical profession is considered to be a high-pressure profession.

5. The medical profession is considered to be a stressful profession.

6. The medical profession is considered to be a high-risk profession.

7. The medical profession is considered to be a high-profile profession.

8. The medical profession is considered to be a high-status profession.

9. The medical profession is considered to be a high-prestige profession.

10. The medical profession is considered to be a high-profile profession.

In conclusion, the medical profession is considered to be a high-status profession. The medical profession is considered to be a high-profile profession. The medical profession is considered to be a high-profile profession. The medical profession is considered to be a high-profile profession. The medical profession is considered to be a high-profile profession. The medical profession is considered to be a high-profile profession.

Note: The above prejudices are the results of the medical profession being considered to be a high-status profession.
